It appeared that on the 2nd of June last the 1st Surrey Rifles were assembled at Kennington, by regimental orders, for "marching out drill," and were afterwards dismissed at the head quarters of the regiment at Hanover-park, Peckham. One Mr. Hodgkins and two other members of the corps then hired a cab, and proceeded towards home, and to do so it was necessary to pass through Kennington-gate. There was no one else in the cab, and the three volunteers were dressed in their uniform, and had their arms and accoutrements, according to the regulations of the corps. The toll collector, Taylor, demanded 3d. for toll, and Hodgkins claimed exemption; but, as the collector refused to allow the exemption, Hodgkins paid the amount demanded. The collector having been summoned by Captain Stephenson, the commander of the corps, for illegally demanding toll, the magistrate decided that the exemption claimed did not extend to carriages used by members for their own private ease and convenience, but was limited to carriages performing some public duty requiring the use of a carriage. He accordingly declined to convict the toll collector, and Captain Stephenson appealed to this Court.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said he thought the decision of the magistrate was erroneous: that he ought to have decided in favour of the complainant, and that the case should be remitted. His Lordship was of opinion that if a carriage was bonâ fide employed in the conveyance of volunteer infantry to their place of exercise, or in bringing them back, it was entitled to exemption; but a carriage in order to enjoy that immunity, must be employed, his Lordship would not say exclusively, but substantially, for the conveyance of volunteers. The mere fact of volunteers riding in a vehicle plying for hire, and not exclusively used for volunteers, would not entitle it to exemption. On the other hand, where a carriage was hired and used for the carriage of volunteers, his Lordship did not think that the mere accidental circumstance that another person rode without paying for his seat would deprive the vehicle of exemption from toll. But the mere fact of volunteers riding in a carriage plying for hire would not entitle it to exemption.

Mr. Justice CROMPTON, and Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, were of the same opinion.

The business of this Court has been very seriously interfered with in consequence of the absence of one of the judges at the Divorce Court. On the 25th ult. the Bail Court did not commence business until 12 o'clock, because Mr. Justice Wightman was sitting in the Divorce Court. On the 26th ult., Mr. Justice Hill sat in the Nisi Prius Court at Guildhall, because Mr. Justice Wightman, whose turn it was to have sat in that Court, was sitting in the Divorce Court; and Mr. Justice Hill was compelled to close the Guildhall Court before two o'clock, in order to attend at chambers, because Mr. Justice Wightman was sitting in the Divorce Court.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Sittings in Banco, Easter Term, before Lord Chief Justice ERLE and Justices WILLES and BYLES.)

April 26—Cahill v. London and North-Western Railway.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who is a commercial traveller, to recover the value of a box of samples of perfumery and other articles. The box was put into a luggage van as the personal luggage of the plaintiff and was lost in the transit. It was covered with a black cover and legibly on the outside marked "glass." The defendants contended that the box was not personal luggage but merchandise, and that as they were not paid for its conveyance they were not liable to make good the loss. At the trial of the action in 1858 a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to a special case for the opinion of the Court.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE was of opinion that the defendants were entitled to the judgment of the Court. The action was brought by a passenger who took a passenger's ticket and who complained of a breach of duty on the part of the railway company in losing his luggage; but the article lost was merchandise entirely, and did not contain anything which came within the description of personal luggage.

Mr. Justice WILLES and Mr. Justice WILDE concurred.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings in Banco, before the LORD CHIEF BARON, and Barons MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and WILDE.)

April 30.—The honorary post of tubman in the Court of Exchequer, which carries with it a right of pre-audience, as well as a particular seat or "pew for one," having been resigned by Mr. Ogle, of the Home Circuit, Mr. Charles Pollock, who had been appointed to succeed him, was requested by their Lordships, at the sitting of the Court this morning, to take his seat within the tub accordingly.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

May 1.—The May general sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex commenced this morning at the Sessions-house, on Clerkenwell-green, before Mr. Bodkin, assistant-judge; Mr. Payne, deputy; Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench, and a large number of magistrates.

Mr. Locke, Q.C., has been appointed recorder of Brighton, which office became vacant by the resignation of Mr. Edwin James, Q.C.

Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Mr. Sholto Pemberton to be Chief Justice of the island of Dominica.

Mr. George Osgood, Registrar of the Sheriff's Court, Guildhall-buildings, Basinghall-street, London, and of 24, Chalcoot-villas, Adelaide-road, Haverstock-hill, Middlesex, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery, the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 3.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR that their lordships should go into committee on this Bill,

The Earl of DERRY moved that the Bill be referred to a select committee. He began amidst some laughter by alluding to a statement he had seen with surprise that the Government had, compelled by his "powerful influence," agreed to allow this Bill to go into a select committee, and disclaimed the idea that any question connected with this Bill could be a party question. He made this motion because he thought it better that the Bill should be considered by a small and select number of their lordships rather than in a full House, where it could not receive the attention it deserved. (Left speaking)

COUNTY COURTS PROCEDURE.

Mr. M'MANON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the procedure of county courts.

Leave given, and Bill brought in, and read a first time.

LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The amendments to this Bill were considered and agreed to.

Wednesday, May 1.

RECOVERY OF DEBTS BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this Bill,

Mr. M'MANON moved, as an amendment, that the House should resolve itself into committee upon that day three months. He stated that the Bill had been brought forward without the authority of the law officers of the Crown. If such a Bill were to be introduced at all it ought to apply to all courts, and should be extended to Ireland.

Mr. HODGKINSON supported the Bill.

Mr. MELLOR and Mr. MONTAGUE SMITH, opposed.

Mr. HADFIELD supported.

Mr. ROEBUCK appealed to the Secretary of State whether piecemeal legislation of this description was not very injurious to the law of England. Alterations such as those now proposed ought to have the sanction of the law officers of the Crown, and to be brought forward under their responsibility. Moreover, the Bill was based on a false assumption—namely, that every debtor was a rogue, and every creditor an honest man.

Mr. COLLIER also thought such a Bill, if introduced at all, should come before them upon the authority of the Government.

Mr. HENLEY opposed the Bill. He had a weakness for trial by jury, and did not wish to see a system of trying cases by affidavit introduced into our courts of law. It would only tend to encourage hard swearing.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—

The Bill was therefore lost.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. WALPOLE said that he had been so much struck by the remark which had fallen from the hon. and learned member for Sheffield as to the necessity for all reforms which affected the administration of law and equity being proposed with the sanction and authority of the law officers of the Crown, that, as he was informed by the Attorney-General that there were many parts of this Bill—although it contained only one clause—which would require much and careful consideration, he would, instead of moving that the speaker should leave the chair, propose that this Bill, the object of which was to alter a rule of the courts of equity, should be referred to a select committee.

After a few words from Sir F. GOLDAMID, who had given notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill,

The order for the committal of the Bill was discharged, and it was ordered to be referred to a select committee.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH RELIEF.

Mr. LOCKE moved for and obtained leave to bring in a Bill to give relief to persons who may refuse or be unwilling from alleged conscientious motives to be sworn in criminal cases.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

A BILL TO ENABLE THE COMMISSIONERS OF HER MAJESTY'S WORKS TO ACQUIRE A SITE FOR THE ERECTION OF COURTS OF JUSTICE, AND OF THE VARIOUS OFFICES BELONGING TO THE SAME.

1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1861."

2. The persons for the time being occupying the offices of Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings shall be incorporated for the purposes of this Act by the name and style of "The Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings," and by that name shall have perpetual succession and a common seal, to be by them from time to time altered as they think fit, with power to hold lands for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act.

3. The purposes of this Act are the acquisition in the same neighbourhood of a convenient site for the accommodation of the Superior Courts of law and equity, the probate and divorce Courts, and the Court of Admiralty, and the various offices connected with them, and of such other courts and offices for the public service as may from time to time be prescribed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, and the erection on such site of suitable buildings, with all proper furniture and conveniences, and the constructing and doing such works and things as are conducive to the attainment of the above purposes, or any of them, or incidental thereto.

4. Gives power to commissioners to purchase lands.

5. Gives power to commissioners to enter on lands.

6. Incorporates Lands Clauses Act with this Act.

7. Errors in plans not to affect commissioners' powers.

8. Relates to the extinction of rights of way and other easements.

9. The limit for the compulsory purchase of lands under this Act shall be five years.

10. Gives power to commissioners to execute works.

11. No purchases to be without the authority of the Treasury.

12. Notices may be given on behalf of commissioners by their solicitor or secretary.

13. Orders concerning money paid into court may be made at chambers.

14. Imposes penalty for obstructing commissioners.

15. No deed, bond, or other instrument made for the purposes of this Act shall be subject to any stamp duty.

16. Directs that deeds be enrolled in Court of Exchequer.

17. Plans signed by Commissioners of Treasury to be deposited in the office of works, &c. and to be open for inspection on payment of a fee of one shilling.

EQUITY.

LIABILITY OF WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE TO DEBTS.

Johnson v. Gallagher, L. J., 9 W. R., 506.

In Owens v. Dickinson, Cr. & Ph. 48, certain freehold property was, by settlement made on the marriage of M., conveyed to two persons to such uses as she should by deed or instrument in writing or by will from time to time appoint, and in default of appointment in trust to permit her to receive the rents and profits for her life, for her sole and separate use, independent of her then intended husband, and after her death to the use of her son by a former marriage, T., and his issue, with remainder over. By the same settlement certain stock in trade, furniture, and other effects of M. were assigned to the same persons, in trust for her sole and separate use during her life, and after her death for T. absolutely. Part of the property included in the settlement consisted of a freehold public-house, with the fixtures and furniture thereto belonging. After the marriage M. agreed with the plaintiff that he should take the public-house as her tenant, at a yearly rent, and should purchase the license, fixtures, &c. for £210, and that on his quitting the premises this sum should be repaid to him. A memorandum to this effect was signed by M. The plaintiff occupied the premises until after the death of M., which happened in the lifetime of her husband. By her will, duly executed under the power, M. appointed her real estate to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of her son T. and other persons, and she charged her real estate with the payment of her debts. Upon quitting the premises, the plaintiff claimed the £210 as due to him from the estate of M., and brought this suit to enforce payment. Lord Chancellor Cottonham, in giving judgment, said that M., having signed a document which recognized the £210 as a debt which, in certain circumstances, she was to be liable to pay, made her will charging all her debts upon property which she had power to dispose of. The document which she had signed alone would have been operative upon M.'s separate estate, "but not by way of the execution of a power," although that expression had been inaccurately used in cases where the Court had enforced the contracts of married women against their separate estate. "It cannot be an execution of the power, because it neither refers to the power nor to the subject matter of the power; nor, indeed, in many of the cases has there been any power existing at all." Besides, claimants under such instruments would be paid pari passu, whereas, if the instruments took effect as appointments, they would rank according to their dates. Again, the transaction had been treated as "a disposing of the particular estate;" but the contract was silent as to the separate estate, and it was not consistent with correct principles to say, that a contract to pay was to be construed into a contract to pay out of a particular property, so as to constitute a lien on that property. His Lordship considered the view taken by Lord Thurlow in Hulme v. Tennant (1 B. C. C. 16), to be more correct. "According to that view, the separate property of a married woman being a creature of equity, it follows that, if she has a power to deal with it, she has the other power incident to property in general, viz. the power of contracting debts to be paid out of it; and, inasmuch as her creditors have not the means at law of compelling payment of those debts, a court of equity takes upon itself to give effect to them, not as personal liabilities, but by laying hold of the separate property, as the only means by which they can be satisfied." His Lordship then went on to notice the argument which had been urged upon him, that a married woman could not be considered as having creditors, and, therefore, that the direction in her will for payment of them could not be carried into effect. "But," said he, "all the cases suppose she can have creditors." Upon the case before him he held the debt to be proved, and as by her will the testatrix had charged her separate property with the payment of her debts, therefore the liability of the separate property to pay this debt was established. But there must be an inquiry as to other debts, "and the authorities were very vague as to what were to be considered debts in this sense." It seemed strange that there should be any difference between a contract in writing and a verbal promise to pay, but upon that point his Lordship gave no opinion.

This case was followed by Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Ben. 319, in which a married woman was entitled, for her separate use for life, to a copyhold and leasehold estate, subject to a prior life estate. There was no restraint against anticipation. The husband granted an annuity on the wife's life, and he assigned the leaseholds and covenanted for the surrender of the copyholds to secure the same. The wife executed the deed, but neither joined in the operative part, nor in the covenants. The tenant for life had died, and the validity of the charge on the wife's separate estate was now disputed. Lord Langdale said that, if the wife had been a covenanting party, this deed would clearly have created a charge upon her separate estate; and even if the deed had recited an agreement that she should be a surety for her husband, and that her separate estate should be made liable to the annuity, he apprehended that the deed would have bound the wife's separate estate without formal words. His Lordship went on to say, "it is perfectly clear that when a woman has property settled to her separate use, she may bind that property without distinctly stating that she intends to do so. She may enter into a bond, bill, promissory note or other obligation, which, considering her state as a married woman, could only be satisfied by means of her separate estate; and, therefore, the inference is conclusive that there was an intention, and a clear one, on her part, that her separate estate, which would be the only means of satisfying the obligation into which she entered, should be bound." On the case before him Lord Langdale held that, though the wife was a party to the deed, there was nothing in it which showed, on her part, an intention to bind her separate estate, and therefore such estate was not bound by it.

In the later case of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen, 2 Drew. 165; s. c., 2 W. R. 293, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley stated his view of the law thus:—"The engagements and contracts of a married woman, having property settled to her separate use, at least such of them as are in writing, are to be regarded as debts, or in the nature of debts, and her property so settled is liable to the payment of them as such; and this principle is entirely founded on the doctrine of courts of equity by which she is constituted a feme sole as to that separate property. It has not yet, indeed, been made the subject of positive decision that the principle embraces her verbal engagements or cases of common assumpsit." His Honour went on to notice the observation of Lord St. Leonards, that the prevailing opinion about 1845 was that the wife's separate estate was not liable to general demands upon her, and he stated his own expectation that when that question arose it would be decided in the affirmative.

Without attempting to refer to the numerous older cases on this subject, we think we shall have said enough to show how this important question stood when a case depending on it came lately before the Lords Justices. In this case of Johnson v. Gallagher, the plaintiff was the assignee of certain upholsterers at Liverpool, who, previous to 1856, had been in the habit of supplying goods to the defendant Jane Gallagher, knowing that she was a married woman living at Liverpool separate from her husband, who lived at Manchester. The whole amount due in respect of such goods was paid by Mrs. Gallagher. In 1856 a deed of separation was executed between Mr. and Mrs. Gallagher and a trustee, whereby, after reciting that Mrs. Gallagher had for some time past been carrying on, in her own name, with the assent of her husband, the business of a wine merchant at Liverpool, and that they had agreed to live separately, it was witnessed that Mr. Gallagher assigned to the trustee all the money, stock in trade, &c., which Mrs. Gallagher had acquired, and all debts due in respect of the said business, to hold the same upon trust for such persons and for such purposes as Mrs. Gallagher should, notwithstanding her coverture, appoint; and in default of and until such appointment, and so far as the same should not extend, in trust for Mrs. Gallagher for her sole and separate use. Subsequently to this deed the same upholsterers supplied Mrs. Gallagher with goods and received from her sums on account, leaving a large balance due to them. Mr. Gallagher died in 1858, and in 1859 the upholsterers' assignee filed a bill against Mrs. Gallagher and the trustees to recover the above balance out of what had been the separate property of Mrs. Gallagher. Subsequently to the filing of the bill Mrs. Gallagher executed a bill of sale by which the whole of the property to which she was entitled under the separation deed was assigned to a mortgagee, to secure previous advances.

Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in giving judgment, said that Mrs. Gallagher did not become indebted for the goods furnished to her, for she was incapable of any such contract during the marriage, and she did not so contract after her husband's death. If she had never been a married woman, and the other facts had been as they were, she would not have become indebted to the furnishers of the goods on a written contract, or otherwise than simply for the price of goods sold and delivered. If it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove an express mortgage, or appointment, direction, agreement, or declaration of Mrs. Gallagher, charging, or purporting, professing, promising, or contracting to charge, her separate property, his case had failed; for there was no documentary evidence, and the other evidence, if writing were assumed to be unnecessary, appeared to his Lordship to be of no account. The plaintiff's case, therefore, must rest on the mere fact that when Mrs. Gallagher bought the goods she was a married woman having separate property and living apart from her husband, who was not liable to the sellers. "Such a state of circumstances," said his Lordship, "whether the sellers, when selling, were aware or unaware that she had property settled to her separate use, is, in my judgment, insufficient to charge her or it." We see, therefore, that the Lord Justice has distinctly declined to make the farther step, beyond the cases to which we have referred, of holding that a married woman can make her separate estate liable without writing and by the mere contracting of a debt under circumstances which would probably raise in ordinary minds the inference that credit was given to her in respect of that separate estate.

Lord Justice Turner stated in an elaborate judgment the reasons which led him to an opposite conclusion. After referring to the cases which showed that the bonds, bills of exchange, and promissory notes of married women were payable out of their separate estates, he said that it had been a more disputed, and was a more doubtful, question, whether the separate estates of married women were liable for their general engagements, such as tradesmen's bills, and claims of that description. Looking at this question without reference to authority, it was difficult to see upon what ground debts of this class could be distinguished from debts of the class before referred to—what distinction there could, for this purpose, be between debts by specialty and debts by simple contract; and, still more, what distinction there could be between simple contract debts of different descriptions. And if no sound distinction could be drawn between the different classes of debts, the authorities which applied to the one class must, as it should seem, govern the other. It was true there had been three decisions that the consideration money paid to a married woman for the purchase of an annuity void under the statute could not be recovered against her separate estate; but then the right to recover such consideration money proceeded upon an implied assumpsit independent of the actual contract, and it might well be that equity would not follow the law to that extent, although it would hold the separate estate liable for the married woman's actual engagements. After referring to the later cases his Lordship said, "The weight of authority, therefore, seems to me to be in favour of the liability; and I think, too, that the principle on which all the cases proceed—that a married woman, in respect of her separate estate, is to be considered as a feme sole—is also in favour of it; and upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that not only bonds, bills, and promissory notes of married women, but also their general engagements, may affect their separate estates, except so far as the Statute of Frauds may interfere, where the separate estate is real property. I am not prepared, however, to go the length of saying that the separate estate will, in all cases, be affected by a mere general engagement. . . . There must be something more than the mere obligation which the law would create in the case of a single woman. What that something more may be must, I think, depend in each case upon the circumstances. What might affect the separate estate in the case of a married woman living separate from her husband might not, as I apprehend, affect it in the case of a married woman living with her husband. What might bind the separate estate if the credit be given to the married woman would not, as I conceive, bind it if the credit be not so given. . . . According to the best opinion which I can form on a question of so much difficulty, I think that, in order to bind the separate estate by a general engagement, it should appear that the engagement was made with reference to and upon the faith or credit of that estate, and that whether it was so made or not is a question to be judged of by this Court upon all the circumstances of the case.*

Applying these principles to the facts of the case before him, his Lordship observed that Mrs. Gallagher, at the time when the goods were furnished, was living separate from her husband, and the evidence showed that the tradesmen who supplied the goods believed that she had separate estate, and dealt with her upon that assumption. So far, therefore, as they were concerned, the dealing was on the footing of separate estate. How was it on the part of Mrs. Gallagher? She was living separate from her husband and had separate estate; "and I think that when, under such circumstances, a married woman contracts debts, the Court is bound to impute to her the intention to deal with her separate estate, unless the contrary is clearly proved. The Court cannot impute to her the dishonesty of not intending to pay for the goods which she purchases. The circumstances preclude the inference that she expected her husband to pay; and in this particular case it is impossible that she could so intend, as she was actually supporting her husband. How, then, could she intend that the payment should be made otherwise than out of her separate estate?"

As the result of this lucid and instructive argument, Lord Justice Turner held that there was a contract affecting the separate estate; but he further held that the separate estate had been taken out of the reach of this contract by the bill of sale executed by Mrs. Gallagher after her husband's death, and after bill filed, to a mortgagee. His Lordship thought there was power to assign, notwithstanding the bill filed, and there was sufficient consideration for the assignment; and the legal title being in the mortgagee, and there being possession under it, the Court could not disturb his title. It appeared that this bill of sale was given to secure previous advances, but it did not appear that these advances were made during the existence of the separate estate, nor did the Lord Justice proceed on the supposition that they were so made. The observation, therefore, suggests itself that Mrs. Gallagher on her husband's death became entitled to hold what had been her separate property as a feme sole, and to alienate it so as to confer a legal title; but she only acquired this right through the intervention of equity, and therefore it might perhaps have been expected that equity would not allow her to defeat claims on what had been her separate estate by the exercise of a right which equity had conferred upon her. Upon this point we could have wished for a further explanation of the reasons which led the Lord Justice to a conclusion different from that of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, from whose court the appeal came. The property in question in this case was personalty, and as a gift of personalty to separate use confers upon the married woman the power of absolute disposition, the right of her creditors, if they have a right, would appear to be coextensive with her interest. But where a married woman has a separate estate for life in realty, and has also a power of appointment over the fee, the reason which would make such life estate liable to her debts, does not appear applicable to the fee. The case of Owens v. Dickinson, from which we started, suggests this difficulty under one of the many aspects which it assumes according to the nature of the limitations which accompany the power given to the wife. Perhaps on another occasion it may be worth while to examine this branch of the subject in reference to the three classes of cases upon powers enumerated by Lord Justice Turner in the judgment from which we have so largely quoted.

Correspondence.

THE NEW LAW LIST.

Your notice of the Law List,* induces me to call your attention to a very unaccountable omission in the volume just published, which seems to have escaped your attention. The Law Lists for former years contained a list of the perpetual commissioners under the Fines and Recoveries Act in London and its vicinity, which I need hardly say was of great convenience (see Law List, 1860, p. 708). Now, in the Law List for 1861 this list is entirely omitted (see index at p. 947). According to the advertisement at the commencement of the book the publishers announce that the information is supplied "by inserting the words 'perp. com.' against the name of each perpetual commissioner in the list of London attorneys," which is of course a very different thing, and fails to supply what is really needed. But what are we to think of the useless and bungling manner in which this has been done when we find, on comparing the list of perpetual commissioners in 1860 with the names of London attorneys in 1861, that in no less than 20 instances in a list of 119 names the words "perp. com." are left out.

A SOLICITOR.

Observing in a recent number of the Solicitors' Journal a review of the new Law List, I would call your attention, and through you that of the compiler, to an important defect which exists in it. It appears to be the practice of some solicitors to insert their names as practising attorneys at places where they have no regular offices, but only give a casual and perhaps irregular attendance. At first sight this may seem a matter of no moment, and it is so to residents in the districts in question who know all the circumstances of each case. To correspondents at a distance it is, however, a very serious inconvenience, and may be attended with loss. It was but the other day that a telegram was addressed to a firm professedly practising here, but who live many miles away. As a matter of course, it was impossible to deliver the message, the expense of which was simply money thrown away. We have, according to the Law List, several practising attorneys in this place, whereas in point of fact the last firm in the list alone have offices, and are, in the common acceptance of the term, in practice in the place. If a plan could be devised for preventing such an abuse of a list coming out with an official sanction for the future, it would greatly add to the utility of the work.

SUBSCRIBER.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

Although I cannot vaunt of having borne the brunt of the world for half-a-century, I can say this subject has drawn me from a privacy I have heretofore maintained, being content as a silent observer, unless a hardship is, or attempted to be, exercised; and when one undertakes a task he must or should have a preconceived idea that he would be enabled to carry it out; and having drawn attention to the exclusive rule of the above society, I harboured the idea that it might have some consideration from its members; but having no desire to "indulge in the luxury of a paper controversy," especially when it can terminate in no beneficial or satisfactory result to the claims I can but faintly and inadequately advocate, I at once throw up the gauntlet, although I cannot but feel that a jury would have given me a verdict, and condemned the Treasurer in costs.

A man who yields against his will
Is of the same opinion still.

A few words more, and I have done. I was not aware, before being informed by "The Treasurer of the Law Students' Debating Society," of the "great liberality," in a pecuniary point of view, of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, by granting them the use of one of their arbitration rooms, fire, gas, &c., with access to "their valuable library," being only compensated by compulsory contributions to its funds. Having a regard to their own interests, most assuredly a very proper and laudable condition; but can it be called "liberality"? The Treasurer will, I know, allow me to correct him as to my setting "so little value" on the library, as I did not—neither did I wish to—depreciate its value, but rather question its use to individual members. And again, the Treasurer, in the profundity of his knowledge and astute reasoning, passes over the argument, takes up the "insult," and puts the saddle on the wrong horse. "A means to an end" should be such as one could exercise without sacrificing his principles; and, were it otherwise, I should not adopt it. The compliments heaped upon me by the Treasurer I can return him double-fold, as he is evidently "the right man in the right place," and one who is or will be an honour to the profession, and whose voice and knowledge I should like to grasp—but a bar intervenes. Mr. Wingate charges me with holding "prejudices," but I think I can, with greater force, return the compliment; and then, in effect, says—patronize an evil to accomplish a good. Now, reasoning after this fashion is repulsive to a sensitive nature; and I would rather say, patronize a good to cure an evil, as in this case you are not subject to that influence and contamination that generally accompanies such an association; but rather, by seeing the ill effect at a distance, you can, with an even mind, better judge of the consequences that arise on the particular subject on which its influence is allowed to play.

A society or club having for its object the dissemination of legal knowledge—as the Law Students' Debating Society—if there is not already, should be, established, making all articled clerks eligible to be elected members, by which a more prosperous and instructive society would be the result, as being the means of imparting knowledge to the many instead of to the few. While regretting the result, I thank you for your courtesy in permitting me space in your columns; and hope at any future time a similar favour may be allowed.

A LIMB OF THE LAW.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS ACT, 23 & 24 VICT. c. 127.

By sect. 10 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, it is enacted "that no person hereafter bound by articles of clerkship to any attorney or solicitor shall, during the term of service mentioned in such articles, hold any office or engage in any employment whatever other than the employment of clerk to such attorney or solicitor in the business, practice, or employment of an attorney or solicitor, save as by the first hereinbefore-mentioned Act or this Act otherwise provided."

A local building society on a small scale is in course of formation by the solicitor to whom I am articled. The business will be conducted in his office, and there will be no other place of business of the society, except, perhaps, for the receipt of subscriptions. The business will, in fact, be conducted by a clerk in his office, but it will be necessary, in the constitution of the society, to have a secretary, who will be paid by a small salary; and it is proposed to appoint me the secretary. The effect of this appointment will be that I shall be secretary by name, but whether so appointed or not I shall be employed in exactly the same manner in the business of the society.

The question, however, has been raised whether, should I be appointed secretary, I should "hold an office" within the meaning of the above section. I am not inclined to incur any risk upon the point; and I shall be very glad if you or any of your readers will give me an opinion whether it would be such an appointment as would jeopardize my admission if it was brought to the notice of the Incorporated Law Society.

QUERY.

PLURALISM IN THE LAW.

I was much pleased with the article in your last number hereon, and I am of opinion that when a barrister is appointed to a superior office to that which he holds, he should resign the inferior one. There is an attorney residing in the borough in which I reside, holding the following offices:—town clerk, clerk to the borough magistrates, clerk to the county magistrates, clerk to the turnpike trustees, clerk to the Lord Lieutenant, and registrar of the county court, and although laden with all those offices, he was greedy enough the other day to accept the appointment of solicitor to a freehold land society, and to contract to prepare conveyances and mortgages for the society at one guinea each. This will shew the truth of the old saying, that "a covetous man is never satisfied." He is also clerk to the burial board; cum multis aliis.

I should be delighted to see an Act passed rendering it illegal for a barrister or attorney to hold more than one public office at a time, so that barristers holding no office should have a chance against the pluralist at the bar, as well as your obedient servant and others amongst the pluralist attorneys.

A NON-PLURALIST ATTORNEY.

REGISTRY OF JUDGMENTS.

"A Solicitor" must, I think, lodge the writ of execution in the sheriff's hands before it can charge the leaseholds of the debtor, as regards purchasers, mortgagees, &c. The Act of Lord St. Leonards neither facilitates, nor abridges, the remedies of judgment creditors whose judgments were obtained prior to the 23rd July, 1860. It does not apply to such, as it has not any retrospective operation whatsoever. M.

RIGHT OF ROAD.

A right of road has for sometime past existed over the premises of A. to premises belonging to B. Lately B. has not only used such road for the purpose of passing and repassing, but has allowed his carts, &c., to remain upon it whilst unloading, to the great annoyance and inconvenience of A. What course can A. adopt to rid himself of this nuisance?

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

A meeting convened to make arrangements for the reception, in August next, of the Association for the Promotion of Social Science was held on the 13th ult., at the Mansion-house, Dublin, the Lord Mayor in the chair. The attendance was very numerous. Amongst those present we observed the Very Rev. Dean Graves, Dr. Lloyd (President Royal Irish Academy); Judge Lynch, General Sir T. Larcom (Under Secretary for Ireland); the Solicitor-General, Sir Thomas Deane, Sir Robert Kane, Mr. Walshe, Q.C.; Dr. Heron, Q.C.; Mr. Orpen and Mr. Barlow (President and Vice-President Incorporated Law Society); W. Haughton (Chairman Great Southern and Western Railway); G. F. Shaw, F.T.C.D.; J. Lemaigre (Inspector-General of Prisons); J. Hatchell (Private Secretary to the Viceroy); Mr. G. W. Hastings (General Secretary to the Association); &c. &c. After some preliminary observations from the chairman, his lordship called on Mr. Hastings to make his statement.

Mr. G. W. HASTINGS said that it gave the council of the association sincere pleasure to have received at their Glasgow meeting last autumn an invitation from the Royal Dublin Society to hold their next annual meeting (the fifth) at Dublin. They had met at four of the chief towns of England and Scotland, and now naturally desired to experience in Ireland the hospitality for which this country was famous, as also of receiving valuable information from the various learned societies and institutions in Dublin. It was gratifying to remember that the Viceroy (Lord Carlisle) was himself a member of their society, and as a vice-president at the Liverpool meeting, had delivered a valuable address, and, as he had assured him (Mr. Hastings) that morning, continued to take a deep interest in their proceedings. Although Lord Carlisle would not be able to preside at the forthcoming meeting of the association, he intended to give it his presence and encouragement in every way. The association was established to investigate the principles, and aid in the establishment of a social science or science of society. The question what such a science could effect, was often asked by persons ignorant of the writings of Quetelet and other writers in France and Belgium; but all persons who had studied the subject were convinced that there was as clearly a science of society as there was a science of the forces which rule the material universe; that the relations of men were as much under laws as the movements of the heavenly bodies. During the short existence of the society (since 1857) valuable facts had been collected by them and by individuals working with them, with a view to elucidate the laws governing society; and as their labours progressed, and their collection of facts increased, better means would exist for forming a real science, which would be of use in legislation as in other branches. The objects of the association were two-fold, as he always considered—theoretical and practical. First, they endeavoured to collect facts as a basis for their new science. But they did not confine themselves to abstruse inquiries. Their second object was the practical mitigation of public evils, and the furtherance of the ends of philanthropy. To accomplish these objects their society was divided into several sections. The first section (Law and Jurisprudence) had already achieved much. A Bankruptcy Bill had been suggested and its details arranged by them, more especially by a committee comprising both lawyers and mercantile men; and on this Bill the present measure of Sir R. Bethell was modelled. By no other means than the appointment of a mixed committee of their society, could the conflicting views entertained on this subject have been harmonized. These valuable results were owing to their broad basis, and the impartiality with which their deliberations had been conducted. Hence their agreement on the details of a measure which would soon reform the bankruptcy law of England. The English and Scotch members of the association might derive some very valuable hints from Ireland; for in many particulars Ireland was some years ahead of the sister countries. The bankruptcy system in Ireland was a better one than the present system in England. Then there were more complete modes of procedure both in common law and equity, and there was also that great experiment the Landed Estates Court, which had been successfully tried in Ireland, but to obtain which efforts had hitherto been in vain in England. In the department of education they had had very valuable discussions, and especially one on the Scotch schools, which would he hoped lead to important practical results. The subject of reformatory schools had been exhaustively considered by them, and there was now no difference of opinion anywhere upon it. Differences of opinion, however, still existed as to the punishment of adult convicts; and the greatest benefit would ensue when the society had the opportunity of seeing, near Dublin, the working of the Irish convict system, under the supervision of Captain Crofton, C.B., an example which would doubtless be sooner or later followed throughout the empire. In the public health section the greatest interest had everywhere been taken. All the large towns had been aroused by a feeling of emulation, each to be foremost in improving the sanitary state of the population—ventilation, drainage, and water-supply. It is as worthy of observation that the first public notice of drinking fountains occurred at their Liverpool meeting, where Mr. Melly read a paper describing those erected by him at his own cost. This paper, with a small illustrative drawing, was circulated, and within twelve months drinking fountains had sprung up in all the large towns in England. Here was a remarkable instance of the good that might follow from one of their discussions. An idea reposes in one mind and is, perhaps, limited in its working to one locality, and the general public are none the better for it; but at a meeting of this kind, where men assemble to inquire and gain information, ideas are rapidly dispersed through the whole community: for each member returns to his own locality and distributes there the knowledge gained by him at the meeting. The fifth section, social economy, had a very wide range, including all questions arising out of the relations of labour and capital, and also comprehended the improvement of the homes of the poor, and of the management of workhouses. The volume on "Strikes" affords conclusive proof that this section has not been idle; for in no other place and by no other persons had a mass of similar information ever been collected. This information was not easily obtained, and a Parliamentary committee would have utterly failed to obtain it. The society had only succeeded by uniting employers and labourers on one committee, with other persons impartial between the two, and so obtaining the confidence of all and collecting facts and statistics otherwise unattainable, and which render the book really exhaustive of the subject. As to the dwellings of the working classes, every possible information that could be gathered at home or abroad, has been brought together in Mr. Roberts's paper published in the transactions. The subject of workhouses had received great attention, and the "Workhouse Visiting Society" had been formed, which had already accomplished much, and will, as was hoped, accomplish far more. The sixth department—that of Trade and International Law—was a new one, and would meet in Dublin for the first time. It arose at Glasgow, where a large number of delegates from foreign countries were assembled, and where resolutions were arrived at which would form the bases of legislation here and in other countries. But from this followed a general desire that other opportunities should be found of discussing international topics; and hence this new department of the society was formed, which would be the occasion of many foreign delegates again meeting at the approaching congress in Dublin, where they would assuredly meet with a hearty reception. It has been objected by some persons that the meetings are "all talk," but even were it so something valuable would result. Nothing is more necessary in this empire than that men differing in religion and politics, and belonging to different societies and institutions, should meet together to exchange experience and knowledge and devise means of co-operating for common objects; and if it did no more, it shows men that they really differ in opinion less than they imagine, and it shows them that although they do differ they may yet work together heartily for many objects in which they are united. Men, indeed, often came together ready to quarrel, and, after hearing what was to be said on both sides, separated in a more reasonable frame of mind. But we might accomplish far more than this—we might establish permanent relations with the philanthropists of Dublin, and leave behind us in the remembrance of those who attend our meetings a belief that our association is not a body merely for pleasant discussions, but also an institution calculated, under the Divine blessing, to do great good for the inhabitants of this empire. (Loud applause.)

Dr. WALLER (one of the local secretaries) stated the nature of the arrangements that had been made. The association would meet some time towards the end of August, and the "Four Courts" would be the place of meeting, a building (or collection of courts round a central hall) so admirably adapted for the congress that, if built for the express purpose, it could not be more suitable. This had been placed at their disposal by the benchers. The Incorporated Society of Attorneys and Solicitors had also very handsomely placed their building at the disposal of the association. Other public bodies had assisted. First might be mentioned with gratitude the cordial and prompt co-operation of a society in a great degree cognate with them—the Dublin Statistical Society. The Royal Irish Academy and the Royal Dublin Society also entered fully into the scheme. Dr. Waller then made some remarks on the excellent reception given a few years since in Dublin to the British Association and to the importance of gaining the assistance of the ladies.

Dean GRAVES, in an able address, proposed the nomination of a "Reception Committee" for receiving the members of the association in Dublin.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL, in seconding the motion, assured Mr. Hastings that a warm and hearty welcome would await the members of the association who might attend the meeting at Dublin. And a not less hearty welcome awaited the subjects they would bring under discussion; for an audience of this city was fully capable of appreciating the truths which the association brought forward. It was with pleasure that he (the Solicitor-General) heard the venerable name of Archbishop Whately mentioned as one of the "Reception Committee," for he was the father of economic science in this country. When the archbishop came over here thirty years since, political economy was unknown in Ireland; but he had founded a Professor's chair in Trinity College, and had educated a class of men capable of fully understanding that science. It was natural and proper that the Social Science Congress should be invited here, and that they should have accepted the invitation. No country in the world presented a better field for investigating and solving social problems than did Ireland. Therefore, benefit might be expected to follow from the presence of the association here, to it, as well as to Ireland.

Mr. FOOTE proposed and Sir THOMAS DEANE seconded the next resolution, by which Mr. N. Hancock, LL.D., Dr. Waller, and Mr. Lentaigue were appointed the local secretaries, and Mr. Benjamin L. Guinness, the local treasurer. Several other resolutions of a formal character were also passed.

Dr. HANCOCK submitted an estimate of the expense of the meeting. Looking to the cost of the meeting of the British Association in Dublin where 2,005 persons attended, and of the Social Science Congress in Glasgow, where 2,872 members assembled, he estimated the expense at £1,200, all of which was desirable to defray by local contributions; so that the members' guinea subscriptions might go intact into the treasury of the central society, where the large expenses of printing the volume of transactions, &c., had to be met.

A vote of thanks was then passed to Mr. Hastings for his kindness in attending that meeting, and for the explanation he had given of the objects of the association; and a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor for presiding concluded the business of the meeting.

Reviews.

An Elementary View of the Proceedings in an Action at Law.

By JOHN WILLIAM SMITH, Esq., late of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "Leading Cases," "A Compendium of Mercantile Laws," &c., &c. 7th edition, adapted to the present practice. By SAMUEL PRENTICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Editor of "Chitty's Archbold's Practice." London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons; H. Sweet; and W. Maxwell. 1860.

An Action at Law: being an Outline of the Jurisdiction of the Superior Courts of Common Law, with an Elementary View of the Proceedings in Actions therein. By ROBERT MALCOLM KERR, LL.D., Barrister-at-Law; now Judge of the Sheriff's Court of the City of London. 3rd edition, prepared for the press by BASSETT SMITH, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworths. 1861.

The late Mr. J. W. Smith's little manual upon the proceedings in an action at law has long been considered as the type and model of a book upon such a subject for students. Last year it reached its 7th and last edition, which was brought out under the editorship of Mr. Prentice, who is well known at the common law side of Westminster Hall, not only as a practitioner, but as the editor of other and more important works than that to which we now allude. This edition is, therefore, as might have been expected, all that beginners can desire as an introduction to the study of common law procedure. So many changes during the last ten years have been made in the practice of the courts at Westminster Hall, that it was necessary of course in some measure to re-model Mr. Smith's work, and accordingly we find that Mr. Prentice has throughout incorporated the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Acts, and other recent statutes, and also noted up some of the more important recent decisions affecting procedure. The book, however, still preserves its elementary character, and has not yet been equalled for the ease and simplicity of its style, and for its general suitableness for young beginners.

Mr. Kerr's treatise has reached its third edition, and is, therefore, sufficiently known to make it unnecessary for us to give any detailed account of it. But for the sake of those who are only just commencing the study of law, and are therefore unfamiliar with legal authors, we may state that Mr. Kerr's treatise is divided into three parts, the first of which gives an account of the superior courts of common law including the House of Lords, and of the auxiliary tribunals such as courts at Nisi Prius, and sheriffs and borough courts. The second part describes injuries cognizable in courts of common law, namely, those that affect the right to real property, and those that affect the right to personal property. The third part gives an account of the ordinary, summary, and equitable, jurisdiction of the superior courts of common law, their sittings and proceedings, their process, forms of action, pleadings and procedure generally. It will be seen by this statement that Mr. Kerr has followed to a considerable extent the classification of Sir William Blackstone, and Mr. J. W. Smith. Mr. Kerr's book, however, is more full and detailed than that of Mr. J. W. Smith, and is, therefore, better adapted for those who desire to obtain not merely a general notion but also a practical acquaintance with common law procedure.

The Law relating to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties in England, Ireland, and Scotland, including all the Statutes and the Decisions on those Subjects, with Forms and Official Regulations. By LEONARD SHELFORD, Esq., Barrister at Law. 2nd Edition. Butterworths, 1861.

Examples of Administration Bonds for the Court of Probate: exhibiting the Principle of various Grants of Administration, and the correct Modes of preparing the Bond in respect thereof; also Directions for preparing the Oaths, and full Examples of Oaths in some particular Cases; arranged for Practical utility: with Extracts from the Statutes, Rules, and Orders; and also various Forms of Affirmation prescribed by Acts of Parliament. By SAMUEL CHADWICK, one of the principal Clerks of Seats of her Majesty's Court of Probate. London: Butterworths, 1861.

It is no recommendation of a legal text-writer, that whatever subject he touches, he also adorns; but it is some praise for such an author to be able to say that however dry and complicated may be the subject which he takes in hand, it will be all the more interesting and intelligible when it has been taken to pieces and classified, and put together again by him. Mr. Shelford, more perhaps than any other living writer, is entitled to say this. He has produced admirable and (if the word be not wholly inapplicable in all such cases) pleasant text-books upon such subjects as Lunacy, Mortmain, and the Law of Railways; and some time ago he could not resist the temptation of bringing his peculiar genius to bear upon that novel and tempting field which has of late been opened up by the Legacy and Succession Duties Acts. This work, of which a second edition has been recently published, is an attempt to classify and methodize the statutory authorities and reported cases relating to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties throughout the United Kingdom; and Mr. Shelford, in his preface, states, we believe correctly, that all the decisions reported on the subjects of this work down to the period of publication, are incorporated in the present edition. The book is written mainly for solicitors. They are practically concerned more than the other branch of our profession with the statutes relating to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties; and Mr. Shelford has accordingly planned his book with careful regard to its practical utility and daily use.

Mr. Chadwick's work is compiled for the express purpose of shewing the mode of preparing the ordinary printed forms of administration bonds for execution, the information upon the subject being conveyed by means of a series of Examples. The work is principally designed to save the profession the necessity of obtaining at the registries information as to the preparing or "filling up" of bonds; and to prevent grants of administration, and administration with the will annexed, being delayed on account of the defective filling up of such instruments.

The Law Magazine and Law Review; a Quarterly Journal of Jurisprudence; for May, 1861. London: Butterworths.

The last number of the Law Magazine contains an article upon the case of Anderson, the fugitive slave, in which the entire law of the subject is exhaustively treated. It also devotes some space to a criticism upon the now famous "Essays and Reviews," considered in relation to the "legal liabilities of the writers." The object is to exhibit the bearing of the canon law upon clergymen and laymen respectively who impugn the Articles of the Church of England. The writer considers at length the effect of the fifth and thirty-sixth canons, which are those containing the ecclesiastical law on this head; and also the effect of the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 12, which forbids, under certain penalties, the "advised and direct contradiction" by ecclesiastics of any of the Articles. He also discusses at some length the case of the Rev. Mr. Stone (Bishop of London v. Stone, 1 Hag. Rep.), against whom proceedings were instituted under Canon V., and also the recent well-known case of Archdeacon Denison (4 Ell. & B. 309), under the Church Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, which is the present statute under which such proceedings are taken against ecclesiastics. The conclusion arrived at by the writer is that the ecclesiastical lawyers can make out no legal case against the essayists, and he claims to have shown that "the latitude in the National Church which the law allows affords the true latitude which each Englishman may claim. The idea of diversity of opinion includes that of degree of error; for truth can only be one, and in no way susceptible of degree or modification."

In another article the merits and demerits of some recent works on the statutory jurisdiction and general orders of the Court of Chancery are fully discussed, mainly for the purpose of showing that the new Text-book on Chancery Practice by Mr. Homersham Cox was not called for by the requirements of the profession, a conclusion in which we fully agree.

There are also articles upon the case of the Emperor of Austria v. Day and Kossuth, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill of the Attorney-General, and reviews of Mr. Hepworth Dixon's "Personal History of Lord Bacon" and Mr. Mayne's recent book on ancient law, of which we also hope to give some account in our next number. Upon the whole, the present number of the Law Magazine well maintains the reputation it has acquired under its new editorship, and is in itself a strong appeal for support to the profession generally.

HINTS TO ARTICLED CLERKS.

No. IV.

HIS COURSE OF PROFESSIONAL READING.

Although it appears to us that the books mentioned in our last article are amply sufficient to occupy the attention of ordinary students during the period of their clerkship, and to give them a thorough grounding in the principles and practice of their profession, we will mention a few other works, which a student possessing more than average powers of application may add to the list, or which he may take in hand after his articles have expired. We recommend him, however, in no instance to take up any of the books which we are about to specify, unless he has previously made himself master of those mentioned in our former article. With this caution the addenda which we recommend to him are "Smith's Compendium of the Law of Real and Personal Property," "Smith's Leading Cases," and "White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity." "Smith's Leading Cases" may now be regarded as a legal classic, and it is the best introduction to a knowledge of case law, as contained in the reports of the various courts. What has been done by Mr. Smith and his editors for the student of common law, has been equally well done by Messrs. White and Tudor for the student of equity; and it would be difficult to find anywhere two books which contain more valuable knowledge, arranged in a more perspicuous manner, or better calculated to fix their learning upon the mind of the student.

Perhaps one or two additional hints may not be out of place here as to the best method of imprinting the learning of the books we have mentioned upon the memory. We can only suggest, however, plans which have been found useful by other students, leaving it to the reader to adopt that one or a combination of them which seems to him upon experiment to answer best in his own case. Repeated reading is the most obvious, and, indeed, whatever other plan may be followed in addition to it, is indispensable. The late Mr. W. D. Lewis, the eminent conveyancing counsel, at the commencement of his legal studies, transcribed the whole of the second volume of "Blackstone's Commentaries," with the view of impressing that foundation of a knowledge of real property firmly upon his mind. The writer adopted a similar course with regard to "Williams on Real Property" and "Smith's Law of Contracts," every page of both of which books he wrote out after repeated perusals. From his own experience he is able to assert that this course is not without its advantages if the mind follows the pen. If it does not, the student might as well copy the alphabet. Another plan is, after reading a chapter or a few pages, to sit down and write an epitome of it; or, if the index is a pretty full one, to read over so much of it as refers to the pages just read, thus getting a bird's-eye view of the more salient points. Or the student may make an index to the book for himself, or enlarge that already made. The last plan we suggest for his consideration is that of framing written interrogatories on what he has read, and answering them also in writing, either with or without the aid of the book. This process compels the student to think, for it is impossible for a man to frame a definite question upon a subject on which he has not some clear ideas. He must, at all events, know what he is going to ask. The same remark also applies to index-making; for unless the reader has understood, and thus been able to form an epitome in his own mind of the text, he cannot index it.

We can hardly take leave of this part of our subject without remembering the time when we ourselves were between sixteen and twenty-one; and, remembering that time, we cannot forget that there were occasions when we felt utterly disheartened in our reading, or when long breaks occurred in it from sheer idleness. Some of our readers, at all events, will be subject to similar infirmities. Sometimes they will be tempted to lay aside their books because they seem to themselves to make no progress. Well, the best remedy for this state of things is just to look back to the commencement of their articles, and see how much they have learned since that period. They will find, if they have really worked, that they have, in fact, made substantial progress, although that progress, if measured by days and weeks, or even months, may seem almost imperceptible. And the same means, steadily pursued, cannot fail to realise the same ends in the future that they have done in the past. The temptation to idleness is more difficult to overcome; but still, unless the fit is a very powerful one, it may be cured by the consideration that if it is allowed to obtain the mastery it must blight every hope of future success and ruin every fair prospect of obtaining an honourable maintenance. Sometimes, however, want of courage or want of diligence will, for a time, conquer the student. Must he, then, despair? No. When better thoughts return—and return they will if he has any British "pluck" in him—let him take to his books again without any useless whining over his past defaults, and resolve to make up by renewed diligence for the precious time which he has wasted.

The clerk who is articulated in town, and the country clerk during the year which it is customary for him to spend in London before examination, will have the opportunity of attending the lectures at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society. It has never seemed to us, judging from our own experience, that a man acquires much knowledge from a lecture on scientific subjects, unless he has previously acquired a considerable acquaintance with the subject treated on by the lecturer; unless indeed, the lecture be, which it rarely is, of the most elementary character. For this reason, we should hardly, excepting under peculiar circumstances, advise the student to attend lectures until the third year of his articles. It seems absurd that a young man who has not mastered his Blackstone should attend a lecture on the niceties of Conveyancing; while on the other hand, if the lecturer confines himself to the elements of that science, they will be more thoroughly learned from Blackstone or Williams. When, however, the student has by his own private reading laid in a stock of first principles, he may very advantageously sit at the feet of one of the learned lecturers of the Incorporated Law Society.

It is usual for the clerk articulated in the country to spend a year in town previously to his admission, either in a conveyancer's chambers, or in the office of some London attorney. If his practice is likely to be mainly conveyancing, the former, and if to be principally common law, the latter course is to be preferred. If, however, the student hardly knows how his future professional life may shape itself, he will do wisely to divide his year equally between the conveyancer and the attorney. While at the conveyancer's chambers his attention should be mainly directed to conveyances on sales, mortgages, wills, and the ordinary class of marriage settlements—to those branches, in fact, of conveyancing which constitute the staple business of the country attorney's office. He will probably only lose his time if he devote himself merely to the niceties of conveyancing, and to those apices juris on which in his future practice he will be fairly entitled to call in the aid of conveyancing counsel. A familiar knowledge of common every day transactions is, in law, as in every other department of life, the most useful acquirement which a man can make. With regard to them ignorance is disgraceful and damaging, while some haziness of view on the doctrine of contingent remainders and executory devises is at the most a venial sin. As moreover the summits of law cannot be reached until the lower ground has been traversed, it seems unnecessary further to insist upon the necessity of a thorough knowledge of common things as not merely requisite in itself, but as the only satisfactory basis of all higher learning. You cannot reach the top of Skiddau without ascending its lower slopes.

The main advantage to be obtained by the country clerk from his going into a town office for a few months is the opportunity which it affords him of attending the superior courts, and seeing how business is transacted at judge's chambers, and in the offices of the various courts. The familiarity with practice thus acquired will give him a great advantage in his subsequent correspondence with his agents, besides sharpening his wits by bringing him into contact with lawyers and lawyers' clerks of all grades, from the office boy whom he will not unfrequently see wrangling, with a perfect confidence in his own learning, before a judge at chambers, up to the most learned Queen's Counsel who ever lulled a Vice-Chancellor into repose or electrified a British jury. His acquaintance with men will stand the attorney in good stead when he commences practice, because to be successful he must be pre-eminently a man of business as distinguished from a mere scholar; and if the "noblest study of mankind is man," it is no less true that one of the most useful studies of the attorney is man—especially of man of the species attorney, attorney's clerk and counsel.

During the last year of his clerkship the clerk will probably receive divers notes from gentlemen offering their services in preparing him for the ordeal of the examination. We did not avail ourselves of any of these offers, because we felt that if after six years spent in the acquisition of professional knowledge, we were not able to meet the requirements of the examination, we ought to be convinced that we had mistaken our vocation, and should betake ourselves to some other pursuit. If the student has mastered the course of reading which we have pointed out to him, and if he possesses an ordinary amount of nerve and courage, he will certainly not require the aid of a "grinder," or "crammer," or "coach." If, however, he has been idle, or if he is a very nervous subject (in either of which cases it must be confessed he is not very well qualified for the life of an attorney to the successful prosecution of which courage and diligence are both essentials) he will probably find it advantageous to avail himself of the services of a "coach," as some of the gentlemen who exercise that calling are really accomplished men possessing a wonderful faculty of imparting the amount of knowledge requisite for a pass. As, however, some of the "coaches" know very little law themselves, or are otherwise objectionable, the student should make careful enquiries before he selects the particular vehicle by which he is to travel.

72. Does a clerk, who has the key of a safe in which his principal's money is kept, with authority to use the money for purposes of business, commit larceny by taking it out of the safe for his own use?

73. Is the mere omission by a clerk or servant to account at the proper time for a sum he had received for his master sufficient evidence of embezzlement; and, if not, what additional evidence would be enough to prove the offence?

74. Is the fraudulent removal of unfinished goods by a servant from one part of his master's premises to another, in order to induce the master to pay wages for them as if they had been finished, but without any intention to take them away, a punishable offence, and under what class of offences does it fall?

75. Where the consent of the owner to part with his goods has been obtained by fraud, what is the test for distinguishing whether the offence is larceny or obtaining goods by false pretences; and where it is doubtful under which of those classes it falls, how should an indictment be framed so as to ensure a trial on the merits, if it fall under either class?

76. What proceedings, and within what time, must be taken by a party dissatisfied with a justice's decision in point of law for bringing the question before a Superior Court, and what steps must be taken, and in what court, if the justices refuse to state a case?

77. Is a party summoned to answer an application for an order to contribute to the maintenance of an illegitimate child, compellable under 14 & 15 Vict., chap. 99, to give evidence for the applicant; and, if so, is he bound to answer questions respecting his sexual intercourse with the mother during the eight months immediately preceding his examination, that being the time limited by 27 Geo. 3, chap. 44, sect. 2, for criminal proceedings in an Ecclesiastical Court for fornication?

78. Have justices power under 9 Geo. 4, chap. 31, sect. 27, to deal summarily with a charge of assault where the complainant desires that the accused should be bound over to keep the peace, or to grant a certificate of dismissal if the complainant withdraws his complaint during the hearing?

79. Are persons who take an excursion of pleasure on Sunday in company together, going 10 miles from home and returning the same night, travellers within 18 & 19 Vict., chap. 118, sect. 2, so as to justify a licensed victualler in furnishing them with wine or spirits between 3 and 5 p. m.?

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY, AT THE LAW INSTITUTION, CHANCERY LANE.

Members are requested to supply the Committee with Questions for Discussion.

QUESTIONS FOR DISCUSSION.

For Tuesday, 7th May, 1861. President—Mr. BRADFORD.

Mr. MELVILLE GREEN will move—"That the secretary do not act as deputy under Rule VI., clause 1, unless he have consented so to do eight days at least prior to his so acting as deputy."

Mr. JACKSON will move—"That the votes on election of Members be taken by show of hands instead of by Ballot."

Mr. HILLS will move—"That the Resolution of the Society of the 8th January last, which provides 'That no Member of this Society other than the opener of the debate shall in future be permitted to speak on any question for a longer period than twenty minutes,' be, and the same is hereby rescinded."

272.—On the sale of goods with all faults: is a vendor guilty of fraud, in case he does not disclose to the purchaser some defect which could not be discovered by a diligent examination?

Mellish v. Motteaux, Peake 187; Bagchols v. Walters, 3 Campb. 155.

Affirmative—Mr. BURRELL and Mr. A. H. MILLER.

For Tuesday, 14th May, 1861. President—Mr. DOWSE.

XCVII.—Is Mr. Gladstone's financial policy worthy the confidence of the country?

Mr. WILLET is appointed to open the debate, and Messrs. SPENCER, SHERRING, and TWINKERBOW to speak on the question.

For Tuesday, 21st May, 1861. President—Mr. LAWRENCE.

273.—A leasehold property was sold subject to an underlease; the lease and underlease were produced at the sale. The lease contained a covenant to pull down the messuages on that part of the ground not underleased, and to re-build at the end of the term, and the covenants in the underlease differ materially from those in the lease. Manufacture, 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, London.

ATMOSPHERIC CLOCKS, OR MERCURIAL TIMEKEEPERS.

These ingenious and simple timekeepers are the most remarkable scientific novelties of the day. They indicate time by the gradual descent of a column of mercury, in a glass tube, which, when descended, or nearly so, the clock merely requires to be reversed. In appearance they resemble the thermometer. Prices 4s. 6d., 5s., 10s. 6d., 12s. 6d., 15s., and upwards. The Guinea Clock with Silver Dial makes an elegant present. They are adapted for all climates, never get out of repair, nor require cleaning. For India and the colonies they are very suitable. Orders, accompanied with a remittance or post-office order, payable to C. LANGSTON, Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C., will meet with prompt attention. Export orders shipped direct to any part of the world, and commissions for other goods at the same time executed on the best terms. Wholesale, Retail, and Export Depot of the Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C. Orders received for CLEGG'S PATENT VICTORIA GARDEN PUMPS, and for CLEGG'S PATENT CARRIAGE TELEGRAPH, or DRIVER'S GUIDE, which will entirely supersede the ordinary check-string.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £3,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

G. F. Heneage, Esq. £10 10 0	Mrs. E. C., add £50 0 0
Mrs. F. C., add 50 0 0	H. Cunliffe, Esq. 40 0 0

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds; a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

W. Stuart, Esq. £300 0 0	R. Few, Esq. £100 0 0
Dr. Golding, Esq. 10 10 0	Ditto 2 0 0
J. Greenwood, Esq. 5 5 0	J. Wilkinson, Esq. 5 5 0
H. Walmisley, Esq. 50 0 0	Ditto 1 1 0
T. Tilson, Esq. 20 0 0	Charles Few, Esq. 50 0 0
Rev. R. H. Cooper 3 0 0	James Parker, Esq. 10 10 0
R. Cobbett, Esq. 10 10 0	Surplus of Subscription
Ditto 1 1 0	for a Testimonial to
E. Wilder, Esq. 10 10 0	Dr. Golding and Mr.
Lord Egerton of Tatton 50 0 0	Robertson 60 13 0

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

Thomas Raymond Barker, Esq., add., £25, making up £100 0 0	The Rev. A. Clumold, £50 0 0
	Messrs. Gale & Co. add. 5 5 0
	Messrs. Cox & Co. 100 0 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The amendments which Lord Chelmsford desires to introduce into the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, if carried, will very materially alter its provisions. He proposes to strike out altogether those clauses which transfer the bankruptcy jurisdiction to the county courts, on a vacancy occurring in the district bankruptcy courts, and which give power to create additional county courts, and to appoint judges thereof. He is opposed to empowering the registrars to make adjudication except in cases where the petition is by a debtor for adjudication against himself. With respect to acts of bankruptcy by a non-trader he proposes that non-traders shall be liable to an adjudication of bankruptcy only upon the acts of bankruptcy applicable to traders, and to restrict the power given by the Bill to a judgment creditor to sue out a judgment debtor summons against a non-trader, to non-traders becoming bankrupt after the commencement of the Act; nor is it to be an act of bankruptcy for a non-trader to remain abroad with intent to defeat or delay his creditors unless he departed the realm after the passing of the Act. He wishes to limit the power of the chief judge to transfer proceedings from one district to another to cases in which the debts are under £300; and to declare that the debt of the petitioning creditor of a non-trader debtor must be in respect of a debt contracted after the passing of the Act. According to the suggested alterations the county courts in which petitions may be filed are not to include Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Bristol, or Exeter. At the sitting for choice of assignees, creditors may resolve that the creditors' assignee shall be sole assignee, and the services of the official assignee may be thereupon dispensed with, or at such sitting creditors may make the official assignee sole assignee. Under deeds of arrangement where holders of bills of exchange are not known the persons with whom the debts represented by such bills of exchange were originally contracted are to take their place as creditors for the purpose of giving or refusing assent. County court prisoners to be included amongst those who may obtain their discharge through the interference of the registrar.

On Tuesday last in the Oxford Convocation there was a discussion upon the proposed Bill for the union of the Regius professorship of Civil Law, and the Vinerian professorship of Common Law—the intended new chair being for "jurisprudence generally, and specially for the principles of Civil and English Law." The result of the debate was that the proposal was rejected by the votes of 96 against those of 59 members of Convocation. It is not very easy to understand what are the precise reasons which were advanced by the advocates of the consolidation of the two professorships. Mr. Neate, the professor of political economy, supported the proposition, because "the separation of Civil and Common Law was no longer recognised in England; and there was no object in maintaining the faculty, except as an unmeaning honour to confer on distinguished foreigners." Mr. Bernard, the professor of international law, thought "Civil Law was best taught in combination with Common Law;" and Dr. Pusey expected that much advantage would result from the consolidation. These are the only arguments in favour of the proposed measure which we can pick out of the lengthy debate, a report of which has been published in the morning journals. The reasons advanced upon the other side are, as far as the public are concerned, of an equally jejune and unsatisfactory character. Mr. Mitchell, the public orator, rested his opposition upon the ground that the consolidation of the two professorships was virtually the extinction of one. Dr. Twiss, the Regius Professor of Civil Law, urged that it still maintained an "important place in our courts, and ought to be kept as a separate study;" while two or three other speakers confined themselves to the more real question as to who should have the right to give away the new professorship, the proposed emoluments being, in the first instance, not less than £400 a-year (exclusive of fees) and when the consolidation was effected, not less than £600 a-year (also exclusive of fees). We say that after all the lengthy discussions which this project has raised at the university, it derives its only importance from the consideration that the appointment will be worth having; and the university therefore is naturally anxious that it should have the greatest number of votes in the board of electors, whose duty it would be to present to the new chair. No one in Oxford or elsewhere is foolish enough to suppose that the new consolidated professor would be one whit more useful than the two professors who preceded him. Professor Bernard candidly expressed what everybody knows when he said that "practically there was no teaching of law except by himself and a few private tutors." The law professorships at the universities have long been given up by all sensible men as antiquated impostures and utter shams. There have long been professors and doctors of law without teaching or students to teach. It is hopeless to expect that there can always be found competent lawyers who will be willing to relinquish all hope of practice or preferment in their profession, for the sake of a few hundreds a-year at a university, where the class of law students must always be extremely limited; inasmuch as at least nine out of every ten students who intend to become lawyers have the good sense to postpone the study of law until they have graduated; and no one would think of then remaining at the university for the sake of such instruction in law as has ever within the memory of man been afforded there. The recent debate in convocation proves beyond all doubt—if any new proof indeed were wanted—that the time has come when the universities should be contented to relinquish some of their unfounded pretensions to universality. The whole domain of learning is no longer mapped out into the seven liberal arts, or into a small cluster of faculties, each with its own doctorate. Classics and mathematics, no doubt, continue to be well taught at the English universities (of philosophy or theology we say nothing), but they have long ceased to be the whole of human or even polite knowledge. Although until recently the order of a Greek play had the best chance of a mitre, and even statesmen were prouder of their expertness in making Greek or Latin verses than of their acquaintance with the doctrines of political economy, in this respect the times have very much changed, and universities are now the last place where any one would go for instruction in some of the most important and influential branches of human knowledge. The Royal Institution in Albemarle-street (a voluntary society) has done more in one year for the development and diffusion of physical science than both our great universities have during the last half-century. They give degrees in medicine, but what has either university done to justify the use of such a privilege? Indeed, they arrogate to themselves the right to pronounce upon the merits of musicians and to make doctors of music; but where in the whole range of English musical composition can one trace the slightest advantage to English music from the teaching or influence of the university professors? Engineers, architects, artists of all kinds and all classes of men who have a specialite, have found out the advantage of ignoring the pretensions of the universities to include the science or cognate arts in which they are interested, in the theoretical universal curriculum of the universities. Is it not full time that the lawyers also should do the same thing, and that an end should be put to the sham degrees in law of the universities? These degrees are not merely an "unmeaning honour for distinguished foreigners," as Mr. Neate predicated of the degree in civil law, but are equally an "unmeaning honour" for undistinguished Englishmen, of many of whom who are thus dignified by the universities with the highest degree in the faculty of law, it may truly be said that they are doctores sine doctrinâ. The proper remedy of this state of things is clearly the establishment of a law university, where the money now contributed by the Crown for the maintenance of the sham professorships at Oxford and Cambridge, might be much more profitably applied in procuring proper instruction for the crowd of actual law students which is always to be found in the metropolis, and who still remain without anything like adequate provision being made for their professional instruction.

The Inns of Court Volunteer Rifle Corps have accepted the invitation of the University of Cambridge Corps, and will go to Cambridge on Saturday next to join the latter corps in a field day. The members of the Inns of Court Corps are to assemble at Gray's Inn at 8 30 A.M., and will march from thence to the Eastern Counties Railway Station. They will be conveyed by a special train to Cambridge, where the evolutions will commence at 11.30. Arrangements have been made for the conveyance back on the same night of as many of the members as like to return immediately. It is understood that several of the principal colleges will arrange amongst themselves for the entertainment of their visitors.

The Council of Legal Education, in order to facilitate the intended visit of the Inns of Court Rifle Corps to the University Corps of Cambridge, on Saturday, the 18th inst., have made an alteration in the days fixed for holding the examination of students of the inns of court. The examination will be commenced on Wednesday, the 15th instant, at half-past nine, and continue on the two following days at the same hour.

Lord Brougham, who is the president, and the Council of the Social Science Association, have issued cards for a conversazione to be held at the South Kensington Museum on next Saturday week, the 25th instant. Members and others interested in the department of jurisprudence who have not received tickets ought to apply forthwith to Mr. G. W. Hastings, the general secretary of the association. The assemblage, no doubt, will be very large and of a very interesting character.

COURT OF PROBATE DISTRICT REGISTRIES.

The Court of Probate Act, 1857 (sect 111), provided that it should be lawful for the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to order that the district registrars should be paid by salaries instead of fees, and to fix the amount of such salaries; and thereupon the fees payable to the district registrars are to be accounted for and paid into the Exchequer. Until very recently this provision was not put in force; but by a Treasury minute dated March 16, 1861, certain salaries have been assigned to the district registrars from the 1st of the present month. These salaries "are intended to be a remuneration for their services, including the preparation of affidavits and other necessary documents for parties applying in person for grants of probate or letters of administration:" and some doubt having existed whether it was any part of the duty of district registrars to prepare such documents, a recent General Order of the Court declares that it shall be so for the future. It also publishes a list of the fees (in addition to the ordinary fees) to be taken in the district registries when applications are made by parties in person, and not through a proctor or solicitor.

Until this Order came into force, the district registrars were generally in the habit of acting as the proctor or solicitor of parties applying in person, without the intervention of other professional aid. This practice was quite as objectionable as that of registrars of county courts accepting business before the tribunals of which they were officers. But the probate registrars, under the system which has just come to an end, usually made regular professional charges; and the only unfairness to non-official practitioners arose from the fact that the position of the officials gave them some advantage in the way of obtaining business, and was not unlikely to attract the confidence of clients. Bad as the late system was, however, that which succeeds it is very much worse in all respects. It is characterised by gross unfairness towards the profession, and is equally impolitic in respect of the public interest. It violates the first principles of political economy as well as of jurisprudence; and is, moreover, the most flagrant instance that yet has occurred of an attempt to introduce the miserable bureaucracy of the continent in place of that independent action and freedom from Government officialism which has hitherto been the pride of Englishmen. According to the new scheme, when in future the District Registrars act privately as professional advisers, they will do so as the agents of the Government, which will henceforth receive into its own coffers all the fees received from this class of business. The published list of fees is in fact the new Government tariff for the transaction of the general probate business of the country. The notion is not merely to provide cheap and ready advice for poor people or in respect of very small estates, but to do the entire probate business of the provinces. Thus we find that for a fee of two shillings and sixpence, in addition to the ordinary court fees, the district registrar has imposed upon him the duty of preparing the oath of executors in all cases where parties personally apply to him, and the effects are sworn under £20, and for a fee of five shillings in all cases where the effects are sworn under £1,000,000, sterling! The same fees are payable in respect of the like sums for preparing the requisite affidavit for the Inland Revenue Office. For drawing these two documents, the estate of the mechanic who dies worth £20, and of the millionaire who dies worth only one shilling less than a million, will pay the same on probate of the testator's will. It must be admitted, however, that a greater nicety and respect for the differences of fortune have been observed in fixing the sums payable in respect of such general business as may be considered to be included under the comprehensive but compendious category of "clerks and letters," coupled with the all-inclusive "&c." It is not perhaps unreasonable or impolitic on the part of Government to undertake, in cases where the effects are sworn under £20, to conduct the necessary correspondence and other business which may be incidental not to the granting, but to the procuring, of probate; but we think it is very questionable whether it is not as unjust to the general public as it is to the legal profession—and whether it is not very impolitic as regards the Government itself—to undertake all this correspondence and other work, where the effects are sworn under £2,000 for 2s., under £4,000 for 5s., under £70,000 for 7s. 6d., and under £1,000,000 for a guinea. What is to be the extent of the advice and assistance, or how many clerks are to be employed, or letters to be written, or what else may not be included in this fee of one guinea, where the estate all but reaches the round million, we are unable to divine. Neither can we say whether in any case the fee will be payable in the event of probate being refused. But it is quite clear that, however this may be, it will be impossible for solicitors who pay their own clerks and the rent of their own offices, who buy their own pens, ink, and paper, and are, moreover, saddled with a heavy special tax, to compete, in point of cheapness, with the Government district law agencies, which are free from taxation and expenses of all kinds.

But, it may be asked, how do we substantiate the charges which we have made against this novel and, so far as suitors are concerned, inexpensive system? We need hardly show how grossly unfair it is towards our profession. The mere statement that we have just made is sufficient to justify this allegation. A more important consideration with the public will be to show how little it is calculated to promote their interests, and how much both its principle and details are opposed to the doctrines of science and to the habits and feelings of Englishmen. In the first place, no proposition in political economy is better established than that which insists upon the advantages derivable from the division of labour; and in this respect there can hardly be a clearer distinction of functions than between the formal ones which belong to a forensic official, and those which are incidental to a legal adviser. Indeed, not only will the district registrar have to discharge duties requiring very different habits of thought and conduct, but involving very opposite and conflicting responsibilities. As registrar, his duties are of a quasi-judicial character, and necessarily must often conflict with those which he owes to his quasi-client. How can he serve these two masters, and be loyal to both? Is he, as judge, to take judicial notice of the flaws which he discovers as solicitor, or will he be bound to overlook them unless they come to his notice by other means? If he conducts the correspondence and acts as solicitor of the parties applying for probate or administration, is he obliged to communicate such flaws to the opposing parties, and to advise them as well? If he is, it will be rather awkward for his clients; if he is not, will it not be unjust to the opposing parties? Whether he is or not, it will be extremely embarrassing for himself, and must frequently bring great discredit upon the proceedings of the court of which he is an officer. Apart, however, from any sentimental considerations of this kind, why should the parties who happen to apply first have their claims asserted at the expense of the public (for that is the simple result of the whole scheme), while those who come second are obliged to fight the battle at their own cost? How can it be shown that good policy requires that the public, at a large expense, should provide, at an absurdly cheap rate, professional advice and assistance for persons entitled to immense fortunes? Why are tax-payers called upon to provide an experienced lawyer, and to pay him and his assistant clerks, in order that the executors of Baron Bullion, Sir Moses Goldschild, or any other millionaire, shall not have to pay more than five shillings for preparing their affidavits, or a guinea for the use of a comfortable office and skilful clerks, together with the advice and direction of a competent lawyer? But we need not add to the number of these interrogatories, although it would be very easy to do so. We shall content ourselves with only one more question—who will be responsible for the laches or unskilfulness of this public proctor? Will the Crown be answerable for the mistakes of its agent, or will a client have to accept cheapness in the place of responsibility? These are all matters requiring consideration; and we now call early attention to them in the hope that something effectual may soon be done for the purpose of putting an extinguisher upon this absurdest of all modern vagaries in the region of so called law amendment.

We have contented ourselves generally with a reference to the probate table of fees. That relating to letters of administration, and another to double or cessate probates, are so similar as to call for no particular observation; but we give the following tables relating to more special business, for the purpose of showing how complete it is intended to make this scheme for the entire absorption of country probate business in the district registries of the court.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

Nature of the right to use a Trade Mark.

The natural right of every one to enjoy, within certain limits imposed by law for the benefit of society at large, an exclusive profit in the results of his powers of invention, whether applied in the production of a new manufacture or in the creation of a work of art, though unknown to ancient systems of jurisprudence, has long been recognised by modern civilization. Some such basis of natural right must be supposed to exist as the foundation, in our own country, of our patent rights, and as the ground for their creation by the restrictive clause in the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jac. 1, c. 3, s. 6, from which our present patent law dates its origin. Again, the exclusive property of an author, artist, or designer, in the productions of his invention, is recognised, and its enjoyment limited, by the conditions which have been imposed by the several Copyright Acts which have been passed since the original statute 8 Anne, c. 19. It is, indeed, difficult to see on what other assumption than that an analogous right exists in the use of a trade-mark, the violation of that right has in many cases been restrained. By attaching to any article of his manufacture a mark or device by which it is known to the trade, or to the public in general, a manufacturer acquires as the result of his ingenuity and skill a special preference in the market for the sale of his goods so marked; and I shall now proceed to consider on what principle are his interests to be protected. In the case of patents and copyright there is a species of property defined by statutory limitation; but in the case of trade-marks such a definition is to be sought only in the decisions of our courts of law and equity, and there is some difficulty in reconciling the various propositions that have from time to time been laid down in these courts, with the recognition by them of a common principle of interference.

The origin and nature of the legal right to protection in the use of a trade-mark is to be ascertained from the species of remedy given for its violation. This remedy is an action on the case for deceit, so that the unauthorised use of a trade-mark is obviously deemed to be a fraud. But then the question arises, on whom is the fraud committed, who shall maintain the action—the trader whose mark is unduly appropriated, or the buyer of the goods the sale of which is promoted by this means? The difficulty is suggested by one of the earliest cases on the subject, which is cited in Southern v. Howe, 1 Pop. 144; 2 Cro. 468, and as it gives us all the elements of the law which govern this subject, I give it in extenso. The case as stated in Popham's Reports runs thus, that, "in 22 Eliz. an action upon the case was brought in the Common Pleas by a clothier, that whereas he had gained great reputation for his making of his cloth, by reason whereof he had great utterance to his benefit and profit, and that he used to set his mark to his cloth whereby it should be known to be his cloth, and another clothier perceiving it, used the same mark to his ill-made cloth on purpose to deceive him, and it was resolved that the action did well lie." On turning, however, to the report of the same case in Croke, we find it stated, that "an action upon the case was brought by him who bought the cloth, for this deceit, and adjudged maintainable;" so that it is doubtful, from these two statements, who was, in the opinion of the judges, the person to bring the action.

Comyns, in his notice of this case (Dig., Action on the case for Deceit, A. 9), leaves this point in ambiguity, although the reference he gives is to the report of the case in Croke; on the whole, however, judging by the applicability of the case to that of Southern v. Howe, where it is cited, it would seem that Popham's version is the correct one; and Lord Rolle, the only other authority on the point, in his Rep. v. 2, p. 28, while he adds, with respect to this action, Semble que gist pur le vendee, yet states expressly that the point was left in doubt by Doderidge, J., who cited the case. From the form, indeed, of action originally adopted, and ever since adhered to, it might well be supposed that an action would lie as well on the part of the purchaser as on that of the trader whose mark is pirated; on the part of the former because a direct fraud is committed against him, when by reason of the mark he is induced to buy inferior goods; of the latter, because by the deceit practised he is excluded from the market, which otherwise he might have occupied, and loses the profit of the sale; the latter course, however, has been followed in all subsequent cases.

We see, therefore, that the ground on which the Courts of Common Law have always protected a trader in the use of his trade mark, is on that of fraud; or, as it is stated in general terms by Comyns, in his note on the passage before referred to, "A fraudulent misrepresentation (and fraud is of the essence of the injury), occasioning damage; the falsehood whereof the person to whom it is made has no means to detect, is actionable."

We come next to enquire, what are the principles on which the Court of Equity has interfered for the protection of this right. In the earliest case on the point, Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 484, where an injunction was applied for to restrain the defendant from making use of the Great Mogul Stamp upon his cards to the prejudice of the plaintiff, Lord Hardwicke denied that there was any foundation for the court to grant such an injunction. He observed that every particular trader had some particular mark or stamp, but that he knew no instance of granting an injunction in the Court of Equity to restrain one trader from using the same mark as another. He thought it would be of mischievous consequence to do it. He denied the force of the objection that the trader was thereby prejudiced by the taking away of his custom, and by distinguishing from all others those cases in which the goods sold were inferior in quality, he leaves us to infer that in the latter case, and then only, would the Court of Equity interfere.

This limit to the jurisdiction has been long since abandoned; indeed, it is not easy to follow the reasoning which led to Lord Hardwicke's conclusions. For, if the fact of the fraudulent injury done to the trade of the manufacturer who uses a particular trade mark is not sufficient to support the jurisdiction, it is difficult to see upon what satisfactory principles the jurisdiction is founded when the goods sold under the pirated mark are inferior in quality.

It is worth while here to remark an observation of Lord Hardwicke's, "that there was no force in the objection that the defendant, by using this mark, prejudiced the plaintiff by taking away his customers," because this position has been completely overruled by the cases to which a reference will hereafter be made, and also on account of the illustration which his lordship offers of his opinion. He says, "there is no more weight in this than there would be in an objection to one inn-keeper setting up the same sign as another." Now, I should be disposed to think that if this was done under such circumstances as would be likely to draw away deceitfully the trade of the original inn, relief might be obtained in equity; and we find that the very point has been so held by an American Court, in a case where an hotel had acquired a very great reputation, and its owner was accordingly protected in that sort of property in the sign of his house (Howard v. Henriquez, 3 Sand. S. C. 722).

It is now clearly established that where the right to use a trade-mark has been sufficiently proved, either by a trial at law, or by long continued usage, a court of equity will in exercise of its ancillary jurisdiction interfere by injunction, and that it will do so on the assumption that the legal remedy is inadequate, and on the ground of irreparable waste or damage. This general principle is very distinctly stated by Lord Cottenham in Mottley v. Downman, 3 My. & Cr. 1, he says, that "the Court when it interferes in cases of this sort is exercising a jurisdiction over legal rights, and although in very strong cases it sometimes interferes in the first instance by injunction, yet in general it puts the party upon asserting his right by first trying it in an action at law, or by permitting the plaintiff, notwithstanding the suit in equity, to bring an action." So far then the principles on which the courts of law and equity have acted in granting relief in these cases, appear to be in harmony with each other, the latter refusing to recognise any species of property in a name or a mark, and, therefore, granting relief only in those cases where the machinery and not the ground of jurisdiction of the former was inadequate to relieve against an injury—the essence of such injury being fraud. That view of the case, however, is hardly reconcilable with the decisions and dicta in Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338; and Welch v. Knott, 4 K. & J. 747. If the principles laid down in those cases are to be hereafter followed, it is clear, that even where there is no fraudulent intention on the part of the persons usurping the trade-mark of the plaintiffs, yet that circumstance does not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to the exclusive use of certain names or marks. There is, therefore, sufficient authority for saying that in the consideration of the court of equity the right of property in a trade-mark is something more direct and specific than it can be deemed to be at law. At law it consists of a right to be protected against fraud; in equity it challenges some of the peculiar characteristics of property; but as it has been laid down more than once that a person cannot acquire property in a mere name, it must be deemed a species of property qualified rather than absolute; still sufficiently precise to enable the subject to obtain a substantial protection.

It is very true that this extension of their jurisdiction on the part of the courts of equity is quite in accordance with the distinctions which have been drawn between the subjects in which they are intended to afford relief, and those cases in which the aid of a court of law may successfully be invoked. It would be hard that a person having unwittingly injured a trader by the use of a particular mark, should be punished by damages in an action at law; and yet very just that the same person should be restrained from continuing the injury, especially as such a continuation could not, after notice of the wrong, fail to be fraudulent. It must, however, be allowed that in granting relief in cases of this description, courts of equity abandon the legal ground of fraud, and can then only be considered to proceed on the ground of protecting property against injury. This view of the question is, I think, strengthened by the consideration that in no case has a Court of Equity interfered unless an injury has been done to property. In Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112, it was considered by the Master of the Rolls to be an objection fatal to the application for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling certain pills as "Sir James Clarke's Consumption Pills," that there was no injury done to property, and that if the Court could have found such a reason for interfering, it might, as in other cases, have done so; and in a recent case of The Emperor of Austria v. Kossuth, before V. C. Stuart, his Honour's observations during the argument appear to lean strongly to the conclusion, that there is a species of property in a trade-mark. The definition, therefore, which I would suggest of the right which forms the subject of this inquiry, is limited by the following considerations:—First, the general right to protection in respect of property against injury, fraudulent or otherwise. Secondly, the quality of the property which a trader has in goods marked with his particular trade-mark; the goods marked and the mark which distinguishes them being, in theory, inseparably connected. Without the mark, the goods are indeed still property, but certainly not a property of the same class, or of equal value. If we once admit the notion of this compound property, it becomes easy to understand and reconcile the difference which now exists in the extent of the two jurisdictions. There is still no property in a mere name or mark; it is open to any one to use it apart from the article to which it was originally applied;—so used, there is no injury to the original manufacturer; neither is there any injury in the use of a name belonging to another person to distinguish a particular article, such person having no trading interest in that article; but in the sale of an article which by a mark or device attached to it, professes to be the property of a particular trader, apart from any intention of fraud, an injury is committed, which it comes within the province of a Court of Equity to relieve against.

It might, at first sight, seem that the case of Flavel v. Harrison, 10 Hare 467, is opposed to this view. In that case, the defendant made and sold an article called "Flavel's Patent Kitchener," (which was in fact a copy of an article that had been long made by the plaintiff), but it appeared that the defendant was in the habit of stating at such sales that the article was not, in fact, Flavel's, but of his own manufacture, so that even supposing the case to have rested on that ground alone, there was room to contend that no injury was done to the plaintiff; but I am disposed to think that the decision in that case rested mainly on the fact that there was a misuse of the name by the plaintiff,—that he had no right to use the word "Patent;" this, as will be shown on a future occasion, has always been held to be a sufficient ground for the Court to refuse to grant relief. There were other circumstances, too, in the case which render it improbable that the decision was arrived at upon the ground of property.

The English Law of Domicil.

X. (Continued.)

To continue the consideration of the case of Bremer v. Bremer, we have seen the circumstances attending Miss Calcraft's various movements, upon which Sir John Dodson considered that her domicil of origin was Anglo-Indian, afterwards that she acquired an English one, and that while she was travelling abroad, she had not abandoned such English domicil. If the marriage with Signor Allegri had been proved, that would have established an Italian domicil; for the domicil of the wife followed that of the husband, but although she both said and wrote an assertion of the fact, and described herself in her will and executed it as Madame Allegri, she confessed to her solicitor that she was not married, therefore, there was no evidence of such marriage; præterit nomine culpam. In her correspondence she expressed her intention "not to return to England, but to live in France when she could." If the domicil was French, it was according to the jus gentium, and de facto only. Time alone would not (the learned judge observed) constitute a domicil; a person might remain for fifty years with an intention to return, and the original domicil was not considered to have been abandoned, and undoubtedly this was quite true. Long residence in one place was a materia ingredient, and from which an intention might be collected, and in the present case his opinion was that the deceased was domiciled in France, although not by authorization

A will was good or bad according to the law of the country where the party was domiciled, and upon this point the opinions of French advocates had been taken, and they were contradictory. The 13th article of the Code Napoleon was as follows; "L'étranger qui aura été admis pour le gouvernement à établir son domicile en France y jouira de tous les droits civils tout qu'il continuera d'y résider," that is, a stranger receiving the authorization of the Government establishing his domicile in France is to enjoy all civil rights there, and inter alia of course, the making a will, and therefore, those who had not received such authorization could not make a will; "Demolombe's Cours de Code Civil," p. 143, sect. 140, Droit Civil, applies to civil rights, although used ambiguously, p. 144; and it was clear upon that authority that a mere domicile was not sufficient without authorization. (De Verne v. Routledge, Sirey's Rep. 1852, Cod. Nap. 319.)

The laws of France with respect to making a will apply as well to foreigners domiciled in France (whether naturalized or not) as to French subjects; locus regit actum is the principle, whether domiciled or not, and even if a person had only been in France 24 hours. That, however, is not the law with respect to British subjects, and it was the opinion of M. Marie, avocat de Cour Imperiale à Paris, that Miss Calcraft was not legally domiciled in France. The 10th article of the Code Napoleon applied to the legal domicile which was constituted not by the caprice of the party residing, but by the observance of certain legal dispositions which were clearly defined in article 102, et seq. of Cod. Nap. Suppose a person having a legal domicile at Bourdeaux came to reside in Paris, and died there, his domicile would be at Bourdeaux. Persons residing in a permanent manner were called "Incolats." No act of a party without authorization can make a legal domicile in France. Sirey's Reports, 1851, Lynch v. Lynch. Moveables of a foreigner not having a legal domicile according to the law of France are governed by the law of the country he belongs to; and this is an anomaly, for it might be held in this country to be a French domicile, and therefore, a man having property in France, and not being domiciled by authorization, can make a good disposition of it by a will in the English form, especially if it be personalty; but the French authorities call on the executors to give security according to the law of France.

The different domicils were called "serieux," "civil," "politique," "ordinaire." But by Baron Mecklenburgh's case, in the "Journal des Tribunaux," "Il attendu qu'il résulte, soit de toutes les circonstances de la cause, soit des documens produits que le Baron de Mecklenburgh avait à Paris son principal et même son unique établissement; que, depuis 1828, il n'avait conservé aucun à l'étranger. Attendu qu'il résulte de ce fait la conséquence légale que le dit Baron de Mecklenburgh avait son domicile à Paris, et que sa succession s'y est ouverte. Attendu qu'il importe peu que le Baron de Mecklenburgh n'ait pas été autorisé par le gouvernement Français un jour en France des droits civils; qu'en effets, la jouissance légale de ces droits est indépendante de la question de domicile que ne reposer que sur celle de savoir ou est en France le principal établissement de l'étranger que y résidé, par ces motifs le tribunal rejette le declinatoire, et déclare competent dit qu'il sera plaide au fond nevoie la cause a quinzaine pour les plaidoiries; condamne les parties de superche aux dépens de l'incident." But on the 26th of July, 1856, the superior court reversed that judgment. This case appeared to Sir John Dodson to be directly in point, and that authorization was necessary by the French law; and he held accordingly that Miss Calcraft was domiciled in France according to the jus gentium, but no farther; and that consequently she could make an English will of personalty, when all her relations, &c. were English, and that therefore she was domiciled in England, and probate must be granted. This decision was appealed from to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who delivered their judgment on the 10th of May, 1857, and which is reported in 5 W. R. 618, who reversed the decision of the court below. The above case settles the important principle that any testamentary instrument to be valid must be made in the form prescribed by the country in which the party is domiciled at the time of death, and that such domicile need only be a domicile according to the jus gentium and not by authorization, that is, that if an Englishman gains a domicile recognised by the English law as such in a foreign country, and makes a will in the English form, such instrument is invalid, because it is not in such a form as would be valid according to the law of the country, where by our law he is considered to have gained a domicile, although that domicile would not be recognised in that country as far as regards the operation of authorization or naturalization, but only by the jus gentium. Whicher v. Hume, 6 W. R. 813.

The following authorities have reference either to the American law as to residence in various places, or as to the view our old law took of settlement, and will be useful to refer to as settling analogous principles to those now laid down as to the law of domicile. Inhabitants of Fitchburg v. The Inhabitants of Winchendon, 4 Cush. Amer. Rep. 190; Story's Conf. Laws, 46; Ware v. The Inhabitants of Sherburne, 8 Cush. Amer. Rep. 267; Winthrop v. Inhabitants of Waltham, ibid. 327; Vattel Translat. 1793, p. 203; Regina v. The Inhabitants of St. Olave's, 1 Strange 51; St. Mary Colechurch v. Radcliffe, ibid. 60; The Inhabitants of Abington v. The Inhabitants of Bridgewater, 23 Pickers. Amer. Rep. 170; Coke Instit. 2, p. 120.

CHAP. XI. (CONCLUSION)

HOW DOMICIL IS AFFECTED BY WAR.

As the condition of being at war materially alters the relations of the belligerent powers in many respects, it may not be improper to consider how the question of domicile is affected by it. In the American reports, the case of The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. Wheeler, 2 Gallison, before Justice Story of the Supreme Court, and Judge Sherburne, of Exeter, New Hampshire, October 1814, contains some very apposite observations upon this subject. The marginal note is this, "If a foreign corporation established in a foreign country sue in our courts, and war intervenes between the countries pending the suit, there is not sufficient to defeat the action, unless it appears on the record that the plaintiffs are not within any of the exceptions which enable an alien enemy to sue. There is no legal difference as to the plea of alien enemy between a corporation and an individual." Story, Justice, in the course of the case made the following observations, "It is said that a corporation established in an enemy's country acquires the enemy's character from its domicile, and that a member of the corporation is a subject of the enemy and personally affected with the disability of hostile alienage. It is true that as to individuals their right to sue in the courts of a belligerent, or to hold or enforce civil rights, depends not on their birth, and native allegiance, but on the character which they hold at the time when those rights are sought to be enforced. A neutral or a citizen of the United States who is domiciled in the enemy's country, not only in respect to his property, but also as to his capacity to sue, is deemed as much an alien enemy as a person actually born under the allegiance, and residing within the hostile nation. This has long been settled on the general law of nations." Omealy v. Wilson, 1 Campb. p. 482, MacConnell v. Hector, 3 Bos. & Pull. 113. The same principle applies to a house of trade in a hostile country. Although the parties may happen to have a neutral domicile, the property of the house being for such purpose considered as affected with the hostile character of the country in which it is employed. In these respects a corporation authorised by its charter to carry on trade, and established in a hostile country, such as the East India Company would, no doubt, be placed as to its property within the same rule, even admitting its members possessed of a neutral domicile. A corporation is held to be an "inhabitant and occupier," under the 43 Eliz. c. 2. Rez v. Gardner, Cowp. 83."

So far as our law is concerned, unless the matter be regulated by treaty, the same rules which apply in time of peace would apply in war also, with regard to one interpretation of the acts of any individual in a foreign country, that is, as to the mere fact of where or what domicile is; but, if there be any rights flowing from that fact, these, primâ facie, except as above, would be entirely suspended. This may be instanced by the inseparable connection which must always subsist between the status of a party, and his or her domicile; what I chiefly refer to, is the derivative title which a party may acquire as being under age, or any of those disabilities or subjective situations where the domicile is not original, but follows that of some other person. In several of the cases before referred to it has been seen how differently this status is regarded and acquired in different countries, especially in France and Scotland, in the one certain formalities being necessary, as applied to the individual, and in the other, those formalities when applied to others, having retrospective reference to that individual. Vattel states p. 103, s. 218, "that an envoy at a foreign court has no settlement (domicil) at that court, the natural or original one being that which we acquire by birth in the place where our father has his house, and we are considered as retaining it till we have abandoned it in order to choose another. The acquired settlement (adocitium) is that where we settle by our own choice."

We can easily understand how an envoy can acquire no domicile at a foreign court, for although it may, and often does happen that the same person fills the office at the same court for many years, yet, the office, like all others under Government, may be determined by the will of that power at any moment, and never, even in the case of a so called permanent situation can be regarded as certainly lasting, and in the case of an envoy or ambassador, must from its very tenure be liable to change. This, therefore, takes away the very element necessary to constitute a domicile, namely, an intention to remain, for no such intention can exist where the party entertaining it may not have the means of carrying it out. War arising between our country and a foreign State would, therefore, not affect the case of a plenipotentiary. The persons most open to its operation would be those, who, having gained a foreign domicile, and possessing property in another country, abandon it, but still possess property in that country where the belligerent state arises, or where they are still resident, and not having abandoned, are still (in a state of peace) entitled to certain privileges in consequence of such domicile. The property in the one case and the person in the other would be materially affected by such a change of relations, and forfeiture and disabilities of various kind must necessarily follow, in the absence, as I said before, of special treaty reserving some right to an alien. This would not, of course, apply to a naturalized subject; for there a complete abjuration of civil and political obligations ipso facto follows the act, and the party is to all intents and purposes the same as a natural born subject except certain disabilities to which he is subject.

There is in France a species of naturalization of illegitimate children; but this differs rather in the solemnities with which it is attended, than in the effects which it produces on the rights and liberties of its object. Where the case is not provided for by international legislation, as a general rule, all relations, as applicable to natives of the country with which the other is at war, are entirely cut off; and, subject to the same exceptions, their liberty, property and rights of all kinds, are at the entire mercy of the country in which they are. This, of course, does not refer to what may be or has been done, but to what the belligerent state has the power to execute or enforce; and it is only necessary to refer to our condition in relation to the continent immediately succeeding the peace of Amiens to make what I mean intelligible. A question might arise how far a residence in a foreign country under the circumstances attending the prisoners of Verdun although voluntary (see Claverine v. Ellison, 4 W. R. p. 330) could be considered as such, but, I apprehend, so far as the mere fact is concerned, even that condition would make little difference inasmuch as the absence of choice, or compulsory residence, could not alter the effect of direct evidence of intention; for the will, at all events, is free, although circumstances render the exercise of it impossible. The effects of war on domicile therefore, are so uncertain and limited in their operation that it would be impossible to lay down anything but general rules with respect to it. A question upon this branch of domicile can only be made internationally, and that must depend upon the particular facts of each separate case. The chief points to be considered are, the relative position of the countries, politically speaking—the obligations legally speaking, of the individual, and the position and nature of his property, and whether he be an alien in the strict sense, and if not, what forms have been gone through affecting his national rights. By these we must be guided; once possessed of the facts, we can easily apply the general principles of law which I have endeavoured in the preceding pages to elucidate and classify.

At a former page of this work I have incidently referred to the pertinent observation of an American judge upon the subject of the impossibility of a man having two domicils, and inter alia, occurs this passage, "If a man had two domicils within the limits of distant sovereign States, in case of war, what would be an act of imperative duty in one, would make him a traitor to the other, as not only sovereigns but all their subjects collectively and individually are put into a state of hostility by war." To put the case, therefore, of possession of property in a foreign country with a domicile there, without naturalization, there would be the mere possession without any of the obligations attached to such possession, and therefore, if there were any right attaching from the fact of being domiciled in that country, they would be effectually neutralized by the fact of the possessor being in other respects an alien enemy; and if he were domiciled in his own country, and possessed property in the other, there would be the rights flowing from the fact of domicile, without the means of enforcing them, which therefore would avail a man little merely as such in time of war. A most interesting case applicable to this branch of the subject occurred very recently, and is fully reported in the 7th volume of the Weekly Reporter at page 387; it is the case of Hodson v. De Beauchêne.

Having now, I believe, referred to all the various branches of the English law of domicile, and to almost every authority in any degree bearing upon such law, I shall here respectfully take leave of the subject and my readers, trusting that my labours have not been altogether useless.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. WOOD.)

May 7.—Clack v. Carlon.—This case raised a short question of some importance as to the costs of solicitors acting as trustees. Mr. Carlon, a member of the firm of solicitors of Carlon & Haynes, was appointed trustee of an indenture containing trusts for the satisfaction of the creditors of certain persons. It was agreed that his partner, Mr. Haynes, should act as Carlon's solicitor in the trust, and should alone be entitled to receive for his own benefit, any costs and charges payable for business done in reference to the trust. The question was, whether Mr. Haynes was entitled to his costs for business done as a solicitor in the matter in addition to the costs, charges and expenses, actually paid by Carlon as a trustee.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the rule being that no solicitor trustee could charge more than his costs out of pocket, the question here was whether that rule extended to a case where the whole of the business had been transacted by the co-partner of such solicitor trustee. The rule was founded upon the principle that no trustee should be allowed to make a profit out of his trust; but there was no ground for saying that a solicitor trustee might not make an arrangement with his co-partner to treat him as a stranger in the management of the particular business. Two firms might come to a mutual arrangement each to transact the trust business of the other upon such a footing, and so might two members of the same firm. From the time, therefore, that Mr. Haynes was acting under the agreement with his partner he must be allowed his full costs.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

BAIL COURT.

(Sittings in Banco before Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN.)

May 4.—Martin v. Hiron.—This was a rule calling upon the Sheriff of Middlesex to show cause why he should not refund the sum of 10s. improperly received by his officers, and the costs, and against Mott and Mayo, two sheriff's officers, for an attachment for contempt, in extorting 10s. for fees not allowed by law. It appeared that the defendant was arrested by Mott and Mayo on the 30th of November; that while he was preparing to go to prison Mott said he should want 5s. fee for a search, and that if he did not pay it it would cost him a guinea when he got to prison. Defendant said he had not got 5s., but if they would go with him to his friend Culliford, in Chancery-lane, he would get the money. Mott went with him to Culliford, who said there was no fee payable. Defendant then said, "Come, let's have no humbug; am I obliged to pay it?" Mott said, "Yes, you must." Defendant then gave his watch to Culliford, who gave the defendant a sovereign, and the defendant then paid Mott 5s. Subsequently Mayo said he had a claim of 5s., and defendant, on the way to Whitecross-street, gave Mayo 4s. 6d. On the 29th of January last the defendant obtained this rule.

The Sheriff being willing to refund the money and to pay the costs up to the 23rd of March,

The learned JUDGE said he should discharge the rule as against the sheriff upon refunding the 10s. and upon payment of the costs up to the 23rd of March, and then the question of attachment for the extortion should be referred to the Master.

May 6.—Woodward v. The Eastern Counties Railway Co.—This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict., cap. 43. It was an appeal from the decision of the magistrates. The appellant appeared to answer an information at the instance of the company for having, on the 4th of February, 1861, at Stratford, refused to show his annual ticket when required to do so by one of the servants of the company. The collector then demanded the fare, which Mr. Woodward declined to pay. It was admitted that the collector knew that Mr. Woodward was an annual ticketholder. There was a bylaw of the company that every passenger was bound to show his ticket when requested to do so; and if he refused to show it, then he should be liable to a penalty of 40s. In answer to the information, Mr. Woodward produced his annual ticket, on which was printed a notice that the holder was to exhibit it when required. It was then contended that this was a special contract, and that the proper remedy was by action. The justices, however, were of opinion that the bylaws extended to this case, and convicted Mr. Woodward. It was also submitted on behalf of the defendant that the company were bound to know the ticket-holders, and that the collector ought to have a list of their names.

Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN was of opinion that the decision of the magistrates was right, and that the appellant was liable to the penalty imposed upon him. If the passenger did not produce the ticket, he was liable to a penalty under the bylaw, and this case came within that bylaw. The ticket itself said it was to be exhibited when required. He was clearly of opinion that when requested, Mr. Woodward was bound to produce the ticket, and having refused to do so, the magistrates were warranted in inflicting the penalty. The conviction must therefore be affirmed.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

May 6.—The May session of the Central Criminal Court was opened this morning. The commissioners present were the Right Hon. W. Cubitt, M.P., Lord Mayor of the city of London; Russell Gurney, Esq., Q.C., recorder; Alderman Sir J. Duke, Sir F. G. Moon, Sir R. W. Carden, Hale, W. Lawrence, and Mechi; Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton and Mr. Under-Sheriff Gammon, and the usual officers of the corporation.

Francis Ellis, Esq., of the Home Circuit, has been appointed judge of the county courts comprised in Circuit No. 34, upon the resignation of Mr. Cooke.

The office of Taxing Master to the House of Commons has been conferred on Charles Frere, Esq., Examiner for Standing Orders to the two Houses of Parliament.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Henry Dias, Esq., to be a Member of the Legislative Council of the Island of Ceylon; and Samuel Brownlow Gray, Esq., to be Attorney-General for the Bermudas or Somers' Islands.

Mr. William Price Yearley, Welchpool, Montgomeryshire, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Montgomery.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 3.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The Earl of DERBY having moved that this Bill should be referred to a select committee, Earl GRANVILLE, on behalf of the Government, consented to the motion.

The Bill was accordingly referred to a select committee, and the committee was appointed.

COPYRIGHT (WORKS OF ART) BILL.

This Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

Tuesday, May 7.

WILLS OF PERSONALTY BY BRITISH SUBJECTS BILL.

On the order of the day for going into committee on this Bill being read,

Lord LYNTHURST rose and said that with respect to the case of Bremer v. Freeman alluded to on a former night, he entertained the greatest respect for the learning of the judges by whom that case was tried; but he thought their decision had tended very considerably, at least as far as residents in France were concerned, to increase doubt and difficulty with respect to this subject. The main question that was raised before them was one of French law to be decided by an English tribunal. The decision pronounced was that a domicile de facto, without the authorization of the French Government, was sufficient to confer testamentary authority in law. That decision created an extraordinary impression on the other side of the channel. Ten of the most eminent French advocates, assembled for the purpose of considering this decision, were of opinion that it was wrong, and that domicile unless authorized by their Government was insufficient to confer testamentary power. He gathered from the observations which had been made upon this Bill that the main charge made against it was that it proposed to interfere with international law. Such charge he believed to be entirely unfounded.

After some observations from Lord St. Leonards, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Chelmsford, and the Lord Chancellor, Lord KINGSDowns shortly replied.

The Bill was then ordered to be referred to a select committee, the members of which were named.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 7.

JERSEY COURT.

Mr. Serjeant PIGGOTT moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the constitution, practice, and procedure of the Court of the Island of Jersey.

Leave granted.

Thursday, May 9.

ALLOWANCES TO WITNESSES.

Mr. W. EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intended to bring in a Bill during the present session to alter the scale of allowances to witnesses at the assizes and sessions.

Sir G. C. LEWIS could only repeat the answer he had given on a former occasion, viz., that he was ready to ask leave to bring in a Bill to enable the counties to make from the county funds any addition which the magistrates might deem fit for the purpose in question.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT).

A BILL TO MAKE BETTER PROVISION CONCERNING THE PROCEDURE AGAINST PERSONS CHARGED WITH INDICTABLE OFFENCES WITHIN THE METROPOLITAN DISTRICT.

1. No charge against any person in respect of an indictable offence shall be preferred or tried at the Central Criminal Court, &c., unless such charge has been previously made and investigated before a justice of the peace.

2. Where the charge has been so investigated, and the person charged is committed or detained in custody to take his trial, or is bound by recognizance to appear and take his trial in respect of such charge, no indictment shall be preferred or found in respect of such charge, but an information in the form contained in the Schedule to the Act shall be filed; every information so filed shall be in lieu of an indictment found by a grand jury, and all proceedings for the trial shall be had in the same way as if such information had been an indictment found by a grand jury, and after the party charged by such information has pleaded thereto, no other objection shall be allowed thereto than such as would by law be allowed against an indictment found by a grand jury after plea.

3. All recognizances and other legal instruments referring to such indictments shall be held to apply to such informations.

4. Where the justice or justices of the peace determine that the evidence is not sufficient to put the accused on his trial, the prosecutor may prefer an indictment against such accused party at the Central Criminal Court, &c.

5. Where notice of intention to prefer an indictment is given, the justice or justices shall cause the examination or depositions taken on the investigation of the charge to be delivered to the proper officer of the court, and if any such indictment be preferred to the grand jury, the officer of the court shall deliver to them such examination or depositions.

6. The grand jury shall be summoned to attend at such three of the sessions of the Central Criminal Court in each year only as the judges shall from time to time by general orders appoint, and justices shall not summon the grand jury to attend at more than four such sessions in any year.

7. Charges returned during a session not to be tried during the same session after a time appointed by the Court.

8. Nothing in this Act shall apply to any charge of treason or misprision of treason, or of any other offence against her Majesty, the State, or the Government, &c.

9. Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to prevent the trial, or alter the procedure for the trial, upon a coroner's inquisition, or upon any indictment removed to the Central Criminal Court, under the order of the Court of Queen's Bench.

10. Nothing in this Act shall interfere with or apply to informations filed ex-officio by her Majesty's Attorney-General or by the Queen's Coroner and Attorney, or to the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, &c.

11. This Act shall commence and take effect from and after the first day of September one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one.

A BILL TO ENABLE CITIES, TOWNS, AND BOROUGHES OF TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND INHABITANTS AND UPWARDS TO FACILITATE THE APPOINTMENT OF STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

1. Act to be cited as "The Stipendiary Justices Act, 1861."

2. Interpretation clause.

3. Any Local Board of Health, or any Board of Local Commissioners, or any inhabitant householders, in any city, town, borough, liberty, place, or district in England and Wales, containing a population of not less than twenty-five thousand persons, may convene a meeting for the purpose of considering the expediency of appointing a justice of the peace. Such meeting shall be convened by notice, and seven days notice thereof at the least shall be given by advertisement.

4. If a resolution be carried by the meeting a petition may be presented to her Majesty, praying that a salaried justice shall be appointed to execute the office of a justice of the peace, such petition to be transmitted to her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department. It shall thereupon be lawful for her Majesty to appoint a fit and proper person, being a barrister-at-law in actual practice, of ten years standing at the least, to execute the office of such justice of the peace.

5. Such justice may act as a justice of the peace, with or without other justices, but must not act out of the limits, of his jurisdiction except in certain cases. And such justice not to be a member of the House of Commons.

6. Prescribes limits within which justice may reside, his attendances and places of meetings.

7. Provides for the salary of stipendiary justice, and the mode of payment.

8. It shall be lawful for such stipendiary justice from time to time to appoint one fit and proper person, being an attorney-at-law of one of the Superior Courts at Westminster, in actual practice, of five years standing at the least, as a clerk, and from time to time, at his pleasure, to remove him. No such clerk shall be concerned, either by himself or any partner, in any manner, directly or indirectly, as an attorney or agent in any matter brought or to be brought before the said stipendiary justice, or in any prosecution at any court of sessions or of the peace, or of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, arising out of or consequent upon any proceeding before such justice, under pain of dismissal from his said office. Such clerk shall and may lawfully take all such fees as are authorized to be taken by the clerks to the justices acting for the said county.

9. Clerk to receive and keep an account of fees, and fees received under the Act to form one general fund. Justices in quarter sessions to appoint a treasurer, who shall give security.

10. Accounts to be kept balanced and audited, and an abstract thereof, audited and certified, to be transmitted to the clerk of the peace, and to be open to inspection.

11. Constables authorized to take recognizances in certain cases without fee or reward.

12. Justices at general sessions may make rate for payment of stipendiary justice.

FINE ARTS COPYRIGHT BILL.

This Bill gives to the author for his life, and thirty years after his death, a copyright in pictures and works of sculpture and engravings made, or for the first time disposed of, after the passing of this Bill; and this right is to extend to a copy of any work of fine art (lawfully made). The same copyright is also given to the authors of architectural works (plans, models, &c.); but when a building has been constructed no person is to be precluded by this Bill from making plans or models from the building itself, and constructing any building therefrom. The Bill includes works of fine art published abroad, and gives copyright in them. But no copyright will be acquired in any case unless the name or monogram of the author is legibly placed upon some conspicuous part of the work. Penalties are imposed for all fraudulent productions falsely pretending to be the work of an artist who is not the real author, or colourable imitations to be passed off as executed by him (whether there be subsisting copyright or not); and, though there may be no subsisting copyright in a work of fine art, no person (except the last proprietor of an expired copyright in it) may use the name of the author upon any engraving during his life. The importation of piracies is absolutely prohibited.

Recent Decisions.

EQUITY.

OPERATION OF TESTAMENTARY APPOINTMENT AS A WILL.

Jones v. Southall, M. R., 9 W. R. 546.

In this case the law as to marriage with a deceased wife's sister appears under a new aspect. The trusts of a marriage settlement were, after the decease of both the parties to it, and in default of issue, in case the lady survived the gentleman, in trust for her absolutely; but if she should die in his lifetime, then after his death and failure of children, in trust for such persons as she by deed or will, notwithstanding coverture, should appoint; and in default thereof, for her next-of-kin. The marriage ceremony was performed, but as the lady was sister of the gentleman's deceased wife, it was void under Lord Lyndhurst's Act. During the gentleman's life the lady executed an instrument which she declared to be her will, and reciting the settlement, and the power therein contained, she confirmed the settlement, and in exercise of the power thereby reserved to her, and of all other powers enabling her in that behalf, she appointed part of the trust monies, after the gentleman's decease and failure of issue of the marriage, to such of the several persons thereafter named as should be living at the gentleman's decease, to whom she gave and bequeathed the same accordingly. And the testatrix gave and bequeathed one moiety of the residue to the gentleman's appointees or next of kin, and the other moiety between her own sisters equally; with a provision that in case of the death of any of the legatees, except her sisters, in the gentleman's lifetime, their legacies should sink into the residue. The gentleman died leaving the lady him surviving, and without having had any children by her. It was now contended, on the one hand, that the will was only intended to take effect as an execution of the power in the event of the testatrix predeceasing her supposed husband, and on the other, that as the will contained words of bequest, and as the testatrix at the time of making it was, in the view of the law, unmarried, it operated upon all the property comprised in the settlement. The Master of the Rolls said that the marriage was a nullity, but the deed executed in contemplation of it was a valid voluntary settlement, and in the events which had happened, the lady was entitled to the property. He held that the will was good. The testatrix was a feme sole at the time of making it, and had power to dispose of the whole of her property. It had been said that her intention was only to execute the power, but her intention clearly was to make a will, and that the property should pass in the manner directed by the will. He was of opinion that the interest of the testatrix was sufficient to feed the bequests, and that the will operated upon the whole of the property disposed of by it.

There had been a suit in the Probate Court, Southall & Huxley v. Jones, 7 W. R. 381, in which probate of this will was granted in the usual form to the executors. The Judge Ordinary in that case said, "It was contended that the reference to the power showed that the testatrix intended to make a contingent will only, that is, a will to take effect in the event of her nominal husband surviving her, not otherwise. But I am of opinion that I cannot presume that the testatrix intended that her will should have such a limited operation. . . . As she had an absolute power over the property, that supports the will, although the special power never arose."

The principle of this decision will perhaps become more clear by reference to the case of Trimmell v. Fell, 16 Bea. 537. In that case trust funds were limited to a married woman absolutely if she survived her husband, but if she predeceased him, she was to have a general power of appointment by will. The wife survived her husband. It was held that the power had not arisen, and that, therefore, her will, made during the coverture, was inoperative. It will be seen that in this case the wife could not make a will at all during the coverture except under her power, which depended for its existence upon a contingency which did not happen. But in Jones v. Southall there was no question about power, but only of testamentary intention.

TAXATION OF SOLICITOR'S BILL MORE THAN TWELVE MONTHS AFTER DELIVERY.

Re Nicholson, L. J., 9 W. R. 441.

In this case, the bills of costs ordered to be taxed were forty-six in number. The first of them had been delivered more than four years, and the last within a year before the petition was presented, but none of them had been paid. The amounts of some of the bills had been included in accounts made out by the solicitor and delivered to the petitioner. It was alleged that the bills contained gross over-charges, such as constituted special circumstances, entitling the petitioner to a taxation beyond a year after delivery of the bills. The solicitor contended that as the bills had been included in the accounts, this was equivalent to payment; but this argument was overruled. With regard to the lapse of time, Lord Justice Knight Bruce observed that up to less than a year before the petition, the confidential relation of solicitor and client had continued; and, "though this was not decisive of the question, still it was a circumstance which must be attended to." It appeared that some of the charges of considerable amount could not be maintained at all, and others were doubtful. On these grounds a general taxation was directed.

COMMON LAW.

ACTION FOR PREFERRING MALICIOUS PROSECUTION, LAW AS TO.

Fitzjohn v. Mackinder, Exch. C., 9 W. R., 477.

When an account of this case was given on a previous occasion* it was remarked that the result at which the Court of Common Pleas had arrived was far from satisfactory, because justice had been clearly made to give way to what, at the most, was a mere technical difficulty. It was an action brought by A., who had been sued in the county court by B., in the course of which proceedings B., by his perjured evidence, induced the county court judge to commit A. for perjury, and to bind over B. to prosecute, which he accordingly did. A. was, in due course, acquitted on such indictment; whereupon he brought the present action against B. This action the Court of Common Pleas held would not lie; chiefly on the ground that the only valid cause of action alleged in the declaration appeared to be the malicious prosecution, which was the act not of the defendant but of the judge who directed the proceedings to be taken. As for the perjury itself of the defendant, that was no cause of action, as had been decided, among other cases, by Revis v. Smith (18 C. B. 126). Against this judgment in the court below Mr. Justice Willes dissented on a special ground of his own, to which we then drew attention. The decision, however, of the Common Pleas has now been reconsidered in the Court of Exchequer Chamber; and has there been reversed by the judgments of Cockburn, C.J., and Bramwell and Channell, B.B., against those of Mr. Justice Wightman and Mr. Justice Blackburn.

The Court of Error chiefly relied on the case of Dubois v. Keates (11 A. & E. 329), which appears to have been overlooked or disregarded in the previous argument of the case. That also was an action for maliciously procuring the plaintiff to be indicted; and it was there held to be no answer that the defendant was bound over to prosecute—the jury being of opinion that such binding over was the result of a malicious charge before the magistrate. Applying the principle of this case to the present one, the majority of the Court of Error held that the defendant must be held responsible for all the natural consequences of his original fraud and perjury, and that one of such consequences was the order of the judge for the prosecution of the plaintiff—or at all events, that he must be responsible for his own personal share in such improper prosecution—that is to say, for going before the grand jury; the obligatory nature of his attendance there, under the circumstances, not protecting him. It will be observed that the Court of Error supported the action, not as one brought in respect of the defendant's original perjury in the county court, but for the injury he committed in preferring a prosecution which he knew to be untrue, and could be supported only by perjured testimony.

PRACTICE—CRIMINATORY INTERROGATORIES NOT ALLOWED.

Tapping v. Ward, Exch., 9 W. R. 482.

The 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, enables either the plaintiff or the defendant in an action, to apply for leave to interrogate in writing the opposite party "upon any matter on which discovery may be sought." This provision—as might naturally have been expected—has already given rise to a copious crop of decisions tending to settle the practice thereon. One of the earliest of these was Osborn v. The London Dock Co. (10 Exch. 698), which raised the important question as to the proper course to be adopted where the proposed interrogatories were objected to on the ground that to answer them in a certain way would subject the party interrogated to a criminal charge. In that case it was held that such interrogatories might nevertheless be delivered, and that the party questioned might then object to answer any one or more of them he pleased on the above ground. But in a later case, in the Queen's Bench (Whateley v. Crowter, 5 Ell. & Bl. 712), the object and scope of the enactment was again carefully discussed, and a broader rule established—namely, that the interrogatories ordered to be delivered must be confined to matters which might be discovered by a bill of discovery in equity. This rule, if it is to be universally followed, appears to be inconsistent with the practice sanctioned by the Court of Exchequer in Osborn v. The London Dock Co. For it is ground of demurrer in equity to a bill for a discovery, that if answered it might expose the party to penal consequences. And, accordingly, in the present case the Court of Exchequer appear to have reconsidered their opinion in Osborn v. The London Dock Company, as they refused to put the defendant to the necessity of saying whether he did or did not object to reply to certain interrogatories of a criminatory character; and discharged a rule which had been obtained for the delivery of such interrogatories in the action.

LAW OF MASTER AND SERVANT—WHEN THE FORMER LIABLE ON THE CONTRACT OF THE LATTER.

Brady v. Tod, C. P., 9 W. R. 483.

The liability of a master on contracts made by his servant depends entirely upon whether the latter had, in point of fact, authority to enter into the contract in question; for no such authority is considered in law to arise out of the mere relationship of master and servant. Hence it lies upon the party seeking to enforce such contract to prove this authority; but it may either be express or implied from the circumstances of the case. Where, for example, a coachman went in his master's livery and hired horses, which his master afterwards used (knowing where they were hired), the master was held responsible for the price of the hiring, though as between himself and his coachman the latter had to provide horses at his own expense (Rimmell v. Sampayo, 1 C. & P. 254). Mr. Lush, in his introduction ("Lush's Pract.," p. 62), gives as another illustration of this principle the following case, which it will be seen has just been the subject of discussion in the Court of Common Pleas. If a gentleman direct his servant to sell a horse, with instructions not to warrant him, and he does warrant, the master cannot be charged on such warranty; but if a horse-dealer gives private directions to his servant not to warrant a particular horse, thereby narrowing his general authority, and the servant nevertheless gives a warranty, his master is bound thereby (Fenn v. Harrison, 3 T. R. 760). The case here put is, in its material points, precisely the same as the present one of Brady v. Tod; and, therefore, the decision of the Common Pleas in favour of the master, is confirmatory only of a distinction which has been already taken. It is to be observed, however, that Fenn v. Harrison was not itself a case with respect to a horse warranty, but as to the extent of the authority of a special agent to procure a bill of exchange to be discounted. The distinction in the text was taken by Mr. Justice Ashurst by way of illustration only; and it has not, until the present occasion, been endorsed by express judicial authority.

THE NEW LAW LIST.

Sir,—In your number of the 4th May last "A Solicitor" calls attention to the omission of the list of "perpetual commissioners" in the Law List for the present year. We now beg to inform your correspondent the work has been re-printed, and that list re-inserted, with the addition of the words "perp. com." against the names of those gentlemen from which they were omitted in the first issue of the work. Any corrections or suggestions will be thankfully acknowledged by your obedient servants,

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

AMERICA.—It is rather an inopportune moment for the professor of the Harvard Law School to send forth his lecture on the constitution of the United States, and on the differences between it and that of Great Britain. Just as the learned gentleman is glorying in the supremacy of the Judicial Body of the United States over congress, presidents, and legislatures, the course of events exhibits that Supreme Court as a mere nullity in the body politic, unable to take cognizance or unwilling to act in regard to matters which are tearing the constitution into atoms. No one thinks of appealing to it or invoking its decision. And, after all, if the court were to decide, what would be the use of its judgment if one or other of the two great parties resisted it? The ultima ratio would be the only means by which the decision could be enforced. In the very midst of the hymns which are offered up around the shrines of the constitution, whether old or mended, all celebrating the powers of the great priestess of the mysteries, there are heretic voices to be heard, which, in addition to other matters, deny that the Supreme Court was ever intended by the constitution to exercise the sole and final right of interpreting the constitution, that it is competent to do so, or that it would be safe to give it this power. Its powers are judicial, not political, and Mr. Calhoun on that very point said,—“Let it never be forgotten that if we should absurdly attribute to the Supreme Court the exclusive right of construing the constitution, there would be, in fact, between the sovereign and subject under such a government no constitution, or at least nothing deserving the name, or serving the legitimate object of so sacred an instrument.” The argument revolves in a circle; it ends nowhere, and there seems no solution except such as concession or a sword cut may give.

FRANCE.—A question of some interest relative to the arrest of foreigners for debt was recently submitted to the President of the Civil Tribunal, sitting of Paris. A foreigner, named Lanzirotti, a sculptor, owed 810*fr.* to traders of the names of Fourdrinier and Chapon, and they obtained from the Tribunal of Commerce a judgment ordering him to pay the money. Subsequently they learnt that his furniture had been seized and sold by another creditor, and they had him summarily arrested as a foreigner, under warrant from the president of the Civil Tribunal. He then applied to the president to be released, on the ground that, as the creditor had taken proceedings against him before the Tribunal of Commerce, and had obtained a condemnation, though not to arrest, they could not put in force the law which authorizes the summary imprisonment of foreigners for debt. The creditors contended that the fact of an action being brought against a foreigner before the Tribunal of Commerce did not prevent the exercise of the power of summary arrest. The president took the same view, but, learning that Lanzirotti was a person of respectability, had long resided in France, and would be able to pay eventually, decided that he should be set at liberty, and not arrested for three months.

Ancient Law: its Connection with the Early History of Society, and its Relation to Modern Ideas. By HENRY SUMNER MAINE, Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law at the Middle Temple, and formerly Regius Professor of the Civil Law in the University of Cambridge. London: Murray. 1861.

The chief object of Mr. Maine's work is stated by himself to be "to indicate some of the earliest ideas of mankind, as they are reflected in ancient law, and to point out the relation of those ideas to modern thought." As the Roman law bears traces of the most remote antiquity, and finds daily application to the present time, it was inevitable that Mr. Maine should draw many of his illustrations from it; but, nevertheless, his work must not be mistaken for a treatise on Roman law. What that work is we shall perhaps be able to explain by means of a hasty summary of the first two or three chapters.

The opening chapter, which is entitled "Ancient Codes," tells us that "the most celebrated system of jurisprudence known to the world (the Roman) begins, as it ends, with a code." But the publication of the code known as the Twelve Tables is not the earliest point at which we can take up the history of Roman law. Many jural phenomena lie behind this and similar codes, and preceded them in point of time. Our best present sources of knowledge of these phenomena are the Greek Homeric poems. In these poems, and in the Sanskrit literature, when it shall be better understood, Mr. Maine would look for the early history of law, rather than in "theories, plausible and comprehensive, but absolutely unverified," such as that of the origin of property in occupancy, which Blackstone has made familiar to all our readers. Turning, then, to Homer, we find that he speaks of "themistes," or judgments, the result of direct inspiration, by which kings decide disputes.

This is the earliest notion connected with the conception of a law or rule of life. It is next to be observed that in the succession of similar cases awards would be likely to resemble each other. Here we have the germ of a custom, a conception posterior to that of the "judgments," and for which the Homeric word is "dike." The familiar Greek word "nomos," law, does not occur in Homer. Quitting the heroic age, the next stage which we reach in the history of jurisprudence is that in which the royal power had given way to the dominion of aristocracies. The office of the king had been usurped by that council of chiefs which is represented by Homer. These aristocracies were universally the depositaries and administrators of the law. They succeeded to the prerogatives of the king, with the important difference that they did not pretend to direct inspiration for each sentence. But they claimed to monopolize the knowledge of the law—to have the exclusive possession of the principles by which quarrels were decided. "We have, in fact, arrived at the epoch of customary law." There is no doubt that the trust thus lodged with the oligarchy was sometimes abused, but it ought not to be regarded as a mere usurpation or engine of tyranny. Before the invention of writing, and during the infancy of the art, an aristocracy invested with judicial privileges formed the only expedient for the accurate preservation of the customs of the race or tribe. The diffusion of the art of writing and the growth of democratic sentiment produced those ancient codes which marked the next epoch in the history of jurisprudence. Of these codes the Twelve Tables of Rome were the most famous specimen. In Greece, in Italy, and in Hellenized Asia, everywhere at a similar point in the progress of each community, laws engraven and published took the place of usages deposited in the recollection of a privileged oligarchy. But it must not be supposed that the considerations now urged in favour of what is called codification had any part in the change here described. Engraved tablets were seen to be a better depositary of law than the memory of a number of persons, however strengthened by habitual exercise. The codes thus produced made small approach to symmetrical classification, and they mingled up religious, civil, and merely moral ordinances, without any regard to differences in their essential character.

The second chapter treats of what Mr. Maine calls in a large sense "Legal Fictions." When primitive law has once been embodied in a code, there is an end to what may be called its spontaneous development. Henceforward the changes effected in it are effected deliberately and from without. To write the history of legal systems subsequent to the codes would seem too vast an undertaking, but for the distinction between stationary and progressive societies which now begins to make itself felt. "It is only with the progressive societies that we are concerned, and nothing is more remarkable than their extreme fewness. In spite of overwhelming evidence it is most difficult for a citizen of western Europe to bring thoroughly home to himself the truth that the civilization which surrounds him is a rare exception in the history of the world." Much the greatest part of mankind has never shown a particle of desire that its civil institutions should be improved since the moment when they were first embodied in some permanent record. "Except in a small section of the world, there has been nothing like the gradual amelioration of a legal system. There has been material civilization, but instead of the civilization expanding the law, the law has limited the civilization." Having pointed out in striking terms the difference between the stationary and progressive societies, Mr. Maine confines himself to tracing the legal history of the latter. "With respect to them it may be laid down that social necessities and social opinion are always more or less in advance of law." The agencies by which law is brought into harmony with society are legal fictions, equity, and legislation. The word "fiction" is used in a considerably wider sense than that in which it is employed by English lawyers. It signifies "any assumption which conceals, or affects to conceal, the fact that a rule of law has undergone alteration, its letter remaining unchanged, its operation being modified." These fictions, in all their forms, are congenial to the infirmity of society. "They satisfy the desire for improvement, which is not quite wanting, at the same time that they do not offend the superstitious disrelish for change which is always present." An example of Mr. Maine's meaning is supplied by the fiction of adoption, which permits the family tie to be artificially created, and which plays such an important part in Roman law. The next instrumentality by which the adaptation of law to social wants is carried on is equity, by which Mr. Maine means, "any body of rules existing by the side of the original civil law, founded on distinct principles and claiming incidentally to supersede the civil law in virtue of a superior sanctity inherent in those principles." This equity differs from legal fictions in that its interference with law is open and avowed. On the other hand, it differs from legislation in that its claim to authority is grounded, not on the prerogative of any external person or body, nor even on that of the magistrate who enunciates it, but on the special value of its principles, to which it is alleged that all law ought to conform. Legislation, whether by an autocratic prince or by a parliamentary assembly, is the last of the ameliorating instrumentalities. Its obligatory force is independent of its principles.

The interest of Mr. Maine's book advances as we proceed with it, and we are almost tempted to regret the choice we necessarily made of its opening chapters to convey to our readers some clear notion of its character and purpose. The third chapter on the "Law of Nature and Equity" approaches subjects of more immediate interest to the English lawyer than are treated of in those of which we have already attempted to sketch an outline. "The theory of a set of legal principles, entitled by their intrinsic superiority to supersede the older law, very early obtained currency both in the Roman state and in England." To such a body of principles Mr. Maine gives the name of "equity." He proceeds to indicate briefly the sources from which the English system administered by the Court of Chancery has been derived, and he then describes the development of that Roman system, of which he well says that the character and the history deserve attentive examination. "I shall attempt to discover the origin of these famous phrases, law of nations, law of nature, equity, and to determine how the conceptions which they indicate are related to each other." The origin of the law of nations is found in the history of Rome. The republic from various causes attracted large numbers of foreigners to its soil. The presence of this alien population obliged the Roman magistrates to assume jurisdiction in disputes between foreigners or between a native and a foreigner, and thus arose the necessity of discovering some principles on which the questions to be adjudicated upon could be settled. The expedient adopted was that of selecting the rules of law common to Rome and to the different Italian communities in which the immigrants were born, or, in other words, the formation of a system answering to the primitive meaning of jus gentium, that is, law common to all nations. "Jus gentium was, in fact, the sum of the common ingredients in the customs of the old Italian tribes, for they were all the nations whom the Romans had the means of observing, and who sent successive swarms of immigrants to Roman soil." The origin of the jus gentium may teach us that the Roman lawyers had not at the outset any special respect for it. The adoption of it was forced on them by a political necessity, and they loved it as little as they loved the foreigners for whom it was intended. There did, however, come a time when "from an ignoble appendage of the jus civile the jus gentium came to be considered a great though as yet imperfectly developed model to which all law ought as far as possible to conform. This crisis arrived when the Greek theory of a law of nature was applied to the practical Roman administration of the law common to all nations. The jus naturale, or law of nature, is simply the jus gentium, or law of nations, seen in the light of a peculiar theory."

Before entering on the explanation of this theory, Mr. Maine makes the important observation that the confusion between jus gentium, or law common to all nations, and international law, and is entirely modern; that indistinct impressions as to the meaning of jus gentium have helped to produce the modern theory that the relations of independent states are governed by the law of nature. We can only indicate in the fewest possible words how the jus gentium became blended with the law of nature. The precept of the Stoic philosophy, to live according to nature, was generally embraced by the Roman lawyers, and the belief gradually prevailed among them that the old jus gentium was, in fact, the lost code of nature, and that the Prætor in framing his edictal jurisprudence on the principles of the jus gentium was restoring a type from which law had only departed to deteriorate. "Simplicity, symmetry, and intelligibility thus came to be regarded as the characteristics of a good legal system, and the taste for involved language, multiplied ceremonials, and useless difficulties disappeared altogether." Having reached this point Mr. Maine next shows how the term "æquitas"—that is, equity—suited the conception both of the jus gentium and of the law of nature, and he then describes how the Roman system of equity was developed in the Prætor's edict, and compares what were really the legislative labours of those magistrates with the building-up of the English system of equity by the chancellors.

It would be impossible for us within the limits of this article to convey any adequate idea of the beauty of style, the delicacy of thought, the depth of research, and the wide and varied learning which fascinated our attention and commanded our admiration as we followed the course of Mr. Maine's inquiries. Law books are supposed to have a prescriptive right to dullness, and the books which are addressed to lawyers on subjects just outside their daily studies fall usually to a depth of tediousness in comparison with which any law book proper becomes light and agreeable reading. But here is a book embracing all law, ancient and modern, within its scope, of which we can say from personal experience that when once taken up it is almost impossible to lay it down. It is so clearly written that there is scarcely a passage of which even a hasty reader would miss the meaning; and it has been so laboriously meditated that almost every page deserves to be read and read again attentively. It is the product of a mind which strives to realize its own high conceptions of beauty and completeness to the exhaustion of a feeble body. We have heard with profound regret that the author is now afflicted with an illness, even more severe than those amid which he has hitherto contrived to discharge his professional duties, and to pursue the studies by which he has gained for himself an enduring name in legal literature. The brilliant intellectual promise, and the uncertain health which marked the author's early days at Cambridge, suggested hopes and fears which have both been completely realised. His life from that time to this has been to his friends a mournful spectacle of mental power contending against physical infirmity.

Suggestions for Improving the Mode of Registering Deeds in Ireland. By Lieutenant-Colonel LEACH, Royal Engineers. Dublin: Alexander Thom & Sons. 1861.

On a subject so important as that of the registration of deeds, no elucidation at the hands of an intelligent and competent person can be regarded as superfluous or unworthy of attention. We, therefore, decline to imitate some portion of the (Dublin) press, in rather scornfully asking what a Colonel of Engineers has to do with, or to say concerning, the registration of deeds? The "scientific branch" of the Queen's army is sufficiently conversant with many matters unconnected with warfare. One officer of the Royal Engineers is busy drawing elevations and ground plans, and all other imaginable designs, for the Great Exhibition of 1862; many more are engaged in surveying in all its ramifications; and a detachment, of which Lieutenant-Colonel Leach is, or very lately was, commanding officer, is peacefully occupied at the Phoenix-park, near Dublin, in preparing surveys and maps (miracles of lithographic accuracy and finish they are) for the purposes of the Landed Estates Court, Ireland. In this way Colonel Leach has become acquainted, to a considerable extent, with the details of the transfer of land and registration of deeds systems, as those systems are carried out in Ireland; and his attention having been called to some defects in the mode of registering deeds, he has published, in a semi-official form, various suggestions for its improvement. It is candidly admitted by the author, at the outset, that the proposed amendments are not claimed as original suggestions, but proceed from some hands more familiar than are his own with the registration books, although less known to fame. But the world is little the better for the labours of its undiscovered discoverers—it requires an intellect to weigh and digest, a pen to formulate and put into shape, and a name to indorse, and certify, and recommend. Without these aids the most ingenious notions lie undeveloped and unfructifying—mere unworked mines, albeit sometimes of valuable ore.

Colonel Leach looks at this subject, not as a lawyer or as a law-amender, but simply as a scientific officer. He does not stay to inquire whether the registration of deeds is, of itself, of any public advantage, but only applies himself to solve this question: Given a general registry of deeds, how can the deeds be registered and indexed in the most simple and efficient manner? Before suggesting improvements he mentions some facts connected with the Irish general registry, which, well known as they are to many, may as well be glanced at here.

The registration of deeds in Ireland was commenced under a statute of the reign of Queen Anne (A. D. 1708), but has been affected by several later statutes. Deeds of all kinds, and affecting all descriptions of property, and even wills, may be registered; and this is done by depositing memorials, or abstracts of the deeds, &c., written on parchment, and compared as to certain particulars with the deeds themselves by the proper officer in the registry office. The particulars given in the memorials are the following:—dates, parties' names, parcels, consideration and general nature of the deed; but trusts, limitations, &c., need not be, and are not usually revealed by the memorial. The duties of the registry-office, stated generally, are—the reception and verification of these memorials, and their preservation, and the keeping of copies of them for public inspection—their registry in index books; (1) under the names of grantors; (2) under the denomination or parcels of land. Further, on requisition from any person to furnish written returns signed by the registrar, of the results of searches in the books for any given period. These written returns are of two kinds, "negative," where the searches are gone over by two searchers for greater security, and their accuracy is guaranteed; and "common," or searches by one searcher without official guarantee. In either case, copies are kept in the office, so that it can never be necessary in searching for any period, to travel over the same ground a second time. The expense of "negative" is about three times the expense of "common" searches. Stamps for the purposes of revenue are imposed on all searches. On an average forty deeds are registered every day. Registered deeds take priority of unregistered deeds; and as between themselves deeds take precedence according to the dates of their registration. It were needless to specify all the books kept, and the entries made as each deed is registered. Suffice it to say that the system is a very cumbersome one; and such as it is, it is not perfectly carried out; for instance, the perfect "consolidated index" of grantors' names is only made up once in ten years, and, to use the words of Colonel Leach, "some of the books are incomplete, others have not been compared, and, consequently, there is an absence of that unquestionable accuracy and completeness which the registry ought to possess." These and other defects it is now proposed to remedy, not only by introducing a better form of memorial, but by the substitution of a printed for a written entry. This "would enable the indexing of each deed to be finally completed in perfect alphabetical or dictionary arrangement in a few days after its receipt," instead of after some years, as at present. "In point of fact, every deed executed by any individual, or affecting any particular lands, could be ascertained with nearly the same facility as a word could be looked out in a dictionary, or a name in a directory; and negative searches would not occupy more than a few minutes instead of days and months, as they now frequently do. It would be impossible to afford the same amount of information by manuscript, owing to the space it would occupy, and the labour, expense, and liability to error it would entail. Printing would do away with the necessity for the enormous number of comparisons which have now to be made. . . . Printing again would render it impossible to alter any of the entries, without the alteration being at once apparent. . . . Another very important advantage of printing would be the ready means it would afford of increasing the number of copies of the index books, which would materially conduce to the convenience of the public, and to the security of the registry. . . . And, lastly, printing would make the reproduction of worn-out or injured books or leaves comparatively easy and inexpensive."

The next topic treated of is that of registration by reference to the splendid series of maps completed by the Ordnance Department. These maps are already largely made use of in the transfer of property by the Landed Estates Court; and they might easily be used in registration, registering by "townlands" or denominations (of which Ireland contains about 63,000, averaging 330 statute acres in each), and using the Ordnance map for general reference to fix the localities, and to define the boundaries.

It is unnecessary to follow Colonel Leach farther into the details of his plan for printing and indexing these entries. The only point of general interest which remains is his proposition to multiply copies of the memorials by the aid of photography, "with a view of producing at a small cost an increased number of copies for the use of the public in the Registry Office; of depositing copies of them in other places of security; and of decreasing the cost of supplying copies to the public." Appended to this publication is an interesting specimen of fac-simile copying, by the aid of photography, from a manuscript, executed on parchment with permanent ink. This process is, we believe, the same as that now being used by Col. Sir H. James, at the Ordnance Survey Head Quarters, Southampton, for the purpose of multiplying fac-simile copies of that venerable registry of title usually called Doomsday-Book.

If these suggestions have value, they are doubtless entitled to full consideration on the part of those who have the custody of certain public records in England. The extensive use of printing and of photographic copying is evidently as applicable there as elsewhere, and would conduce greatly to the public convenience and security. Satisfactory copies of wills, for instance, cannot always be made in manuscript; cancelled words and passages, interlineations, &c., are in many instances very material to the reading and construction of the instrument. It is, moreover, an unsafe and objectionable practice, to allow the original will to leave the registry for the purpose of being given in evidence at Nisi Prius, where "copies" are now inadmissible. The rules of law must, like all other rules and dogmas, conform to the progress of science; and a photographic fac-simile copy of a will, certified by the registrar, ought to be rendered for every conceivable purpose, as good as the original. Similar copies (for they may be multiplied ad infinitum far more cheaply than if copied by hand) might be furnished to parties requiring them; and such a fac-simile copy should, where the original is retained in a district registry, be transmitted to the principal registry of the Court of Probate.

The registration of deeds in Ireland, as established by the statute of Anne, was, considering the period, and the unsettled state of the country then, and for nearly a century later, a very useful and statesmanlike measure. If in our day it contributes nothing towards the simplification of title, while it adds to the cost of investigation and transfer, those results are attributable to the comparative carelessness about the custody of the deeds themselves, which the fact of their being on a public registry seems to induce; and also to the habit (formerly unchecked by the proper authorities) of registering deeds loosely and imperfectly. We regard as provable these two propositions—first, that the general registry in Ireland must be retained, and must be made more perfect in its machinery by adopting the means suggested by Colonel Leach for its improvement. Second, that its results are not such as to render it desirable that a registry of deeds should be introduced for the whole of England. It is no discredit to the legislators of the time of Anne to say, that those of the Victorian era have devised less cumbersome methods of imparting security to titles, and of facilitating transfers of real property.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

EASTER TERM, 1861.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

Jacob John Moser, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Swainson, of Lancaster; and Mr. Robert Marshall, of Verulam-buildings, London.

John William Bacon Grey, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Powell and Newman, of Newport Pagnell; and Messrs. Pattison and Wigg, of Clement's-lane, London.

Thomas Goodman, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Clark of the Sessions House, Old Bailey, London; and Mr. Henry Ivory, of the Sessions House, London.

John William North, aged 24, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edwin John Hayes, of Wolverhampton; and Messrs. Sharpe, Jackson, and Parker, of Bedford-row, London.

Frederick Messiter, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Messiter, of Frome, and Mr. Malim Messiter, of Frome; and Mr. Thomas Henry Smith, of Frederick's-place, Old Jewry, London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Moser, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn, and as a further mark of distinction, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Grey, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clement's-inn.

To Mr. Goodman, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. North, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Messiter, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

Thomas Brevitt, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Duignan and Ebsworth, of Walsall; and Messrs. Eyre and Lawson, of John-street, Bedford-row.

Richard Betton Charles Pulsford Foster, aged 24, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Scarth and Sprott, of Shrewsbury.

William Henry Moberly the younger, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Henry Moberly, of Southampton; and Messrs. Shum and Crossman, of King's-road, Bedford-row.

John Price, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Mr. Jacob Strickland, of Bristol; and Mr. Robert Shuttleworth Gregson, of Angel-court, London.

William Tilly, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Johnson, of Lancaster; and Mr. William Skilbeck, of Southampton-buildings, London.

John Wintringham, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Babb and Grange, of Grimsby; and Messrs. Hill and Son, of Throgmorton-street, London.

The council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners have further announced to the following candidates that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes or certificates of merit, if they had been under the age of 26:—

Henry William Bleby, B.A., aged 29, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Armstrong, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and Mr. Samuel Rowles Pattison, of Clement's-lane, London.

William Alexander Crump, aged 34, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Wilson Nicholson, of Lime-street, London.

John Hammett Knott, aged 37, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Pownall, Son, and Cross, of Staple-inn, London.

Sydney Mayhew, aged 27, who served his clerkship to Mr. Alfred Mayhew, of Carey-street; and Mr. Henry White, of Southampton-street, Bloomsbury.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 161; of these, 90 were passed, and 11 postponed.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without the risk of co-partnership.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are given as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,987 10	£6,987 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1859, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

ATMOSPHERIC CLOCKS, OR MERCURIAL

TIMEKEEPERS.—These ingenious and simple timekeepers are the most remarkable scientific novelties of the day. They indicate time by the gradual descent of a column of mercury, in a glass tube, which, when descended, or nearly so, the clock merely requires to be reversed. In appearance they resemble the thermometer. Prices 4s. 6d., 5s., 10s. 6d., 12s. 6d., 15s., and upwards. The Guinea Clock with Silver Dial makes an elegant present. They are adapted for all climates, never get out of repair, nor require cleaning. For India and the colonies they are very suitable. Orders, accompanied with a remittance or post-office order, payable to C. LANGSTON, Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C., will meet with prompt attention. Export orders shipped direct to any part of the world, and commissions for other goods at the same time executed on the best terms. Wholesale, Retail, and Export Depot of the Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C. Orders received for CLEGG'S PATENT VICTORIA GARDEN PUMPS, and for CLEGG'S PATENT CARRIAGE TELEGRAPH, or DRIVER'S GUIDE, which will completely supersede the ordinary check-string.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £3,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

G. F. Heneage, Esq. £10 10 0 | Mrs. E. C., add £50 0 0
 Mrs. F. C., add 50 0 0 | H. Cunliffe, Esq. 40 0 0

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds; a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

W. Stuart, Esq. £500 0 0	R. Few, Esq. £100 0 0
Dr. Golding 10 10 0	Ditto 2 0 0
J. Greenwood, Esq. 5 5 0	J. Wilkinson, Esq. 5 5 0
H. Walmisley, Esq. 50 0 0	Ditto 1 1 0
T. Tilson, Esq. 20 0 0	Charles Few, Esq. 50 0 0
Rev. R. H. Cooper 3 0 0	James Parker, Esq. 10 10 0
R. Cobbett, Esq. 10 10 0	Surplus of Subscription
Ditto 1 1 0	for a Testimonial to
E. Wilder, Esq. 10 10 0	Dr. Golding and Mr.
Lord Egerton of Tatton 50 0 0	Robertson 60 12 0

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds, to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

	Messrs. Cox & Co. 100 0 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers.

LONDON, MAY 18, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

We are informed that, having regard to the extent of the business in the several district registries in the last three years, the salaries of the district registrars have been fixed at the sums specified in the subjoined first schedule, to commence from 1st of May, 1861, from which date all fees received by those officers under the tables duly authorized for the purpose, will, in conformity with the 23rd section of the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 111, be collected and received by means of stamps. These salaries are intended to remunerate the district registrars for the whole of their services, including as part of their official duties the performance of the business of preparing affidavits, and other necessary documents, on personal applications. Considering, however, that this business has not heretofore been imposed upon the registrars as an obligation, and that where it has been voluntarily undertaken by them they have derived additional income from it, of which advantage they will now be deprived, an allowance will be made to the present registrars in addition to their salaries, so long as they may hold their offices, of the sums stated in the second schedule. The future registrars will receive only the salaries in the first schedule.

The schedule is as follows:—

There appears to be some uncertainty as to the scale of fees payable to country commissioners on swearing affidavits, and we are told that the practice is very various, not only as between different towns, but even in the same place; and we have been sometimes asked for information upon the subject. The fees in Chancery are at present regulated by the Order of the 13th of January, 1857, which fixes 2s. 6d. as the proper fee to be paid to a commissioner in the country—the fee to a London commissioner being only 1s. 6d. The fee for marking an exhibit is 1s., either for town or country. By an Order of the 12th of November, 1858, the commissioner authorised to administer oaths in a court of probate is entitled to 1s. 6d. only for the oath and 1s. for marking each exhibit; but as there are, we believe, no commissioners specially appointed by the judge for the Court of Probate, and chancery commissioners are under the Court of Probate Acts authorised to act as commissioners for the Court of Probate, it has probably been the general practice for them to charge the same fees as they would be entitled to charge if acting for the Court of Chancery. The common law fees for country affidavits are still governed by the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 5, which is entitled “An Act for taking affidavits in the country, to be made use of in the Courts of King’s Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.” The 3rd section of that Act gives the person empowered to take any such affidavit the right to receive “the sum or fee of twelve-pence and no more.”

If any reliance can be placed upon rumour, there appears to be little doubt that several of the Law Lords are so strongly opposed to the appointment of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, as to make it extremely improbable that this feature of the Attorney-General’s scheme will receive the sanction of the House of Lords. It is expected, however, that their Lordships’ Select Committee, which was a short time ago appointed to consider the measure, will make their report in a few days, and that the Bill will be sent back to the House of Commons immediately after the Whitsuntide holidays.

A petition against the income tax signed, we understand by not fewer than 700 solicitors practising in London has been presented to the House of Commons. We believe that it speaks the mind of the entire profession as to the grievous hardship in respect of special taxation under which solicitors labour, while in common with all professional men and others earning precarious incomes, they have to complain of the unequal and unfair pressure of the present mode of raising the income tax. The petition is as follows:—

That there are about 10,000 practising attorneys and solicitors in England and Wales.

That every attorney and solicitor on entering the profession became bound to an attorney and solicitor by articles of clerkship, on which he paid a very heavy stamp duty. If his articles bore date prior to the 4th of August, 1853, the duty was £120, and if subsequently to that date the duty was £80.

That every attorney and solicitor also paid a stamp duty of £25 on his admission.

That no attorney or solicitor can lawfully practise as such, unless he annually take out a certificate, for which, after three years from his admission, he annually pays, if in London, a stamp duty of £9, and if in the country, a stamp duty of £6. During the first three years, the certificate duty for London is £4 10s., and for the country, £3.

That no member of any other profession or calling is subjected to this kind of triple poll tax.

That it is essential to the interests of the public at large that attorneys and solicitors should be well-educated gentlemen, and that encouragement should be given to men of liberal education and high principles to enter the profession.

That the income derived by the great body of attorneys and solicitors from the practice of their profession is very limited, and although there may be some large and long-established firms whose incomes are considerable, these are comparatively very few in number, and it would be in the highest degree unjust to introduce or maintain fiscal regulations affecting the entire body on arguments founded on instances so exceptional.

That there is reason to believe that the total incomes of the whole body of attorneys and solicitors do not amount on an average to £200 a-year each, and that the income tax returns, if examined, would confirm this estimate.

That the incomes of nearly all the practising attorneys and solicitors are uncertain and variable and depend almost wholly on their individual personal exertions; they are subject to diminution from illness, and, of course, cease entirely on death.

That the difference in saleable value between the business of an attorney or solicitor, and a life interest in land or money is enormous.

That the business of the largest and longest established firms will not produce more than three years' purchase, and two years' purchase is a high price to pay for smaller businesses, and there are many thousands which would not sell for more than one year's purchase, if for so much.

That an attorney with a practice producing on an average of several years, £1,000 a-year, could not sell it for more than £3,000, and probably would not get more for it than from £2,000 to £2,500; whilst at the age of fifty a life interest of £1,000 a-year in land or money would at least be worth £12,000, estimated on a 5 per cent. table, and considerably more if estimated on a 4 or 3 per cent. table.

The petition prays that Parliament may adjust the amount of the Income Tax, and distinguish precarious and uncertain professional incomes, from incomes which are fixed and permanent.

An event which is likely to occasion considerable interest, both to lawyers and church parties, has lately occurred at Ripon. A tombstone, which had been recently erected in the churchyard there, was removed a few days ago upon an order from the bishop, who considered that he had power to do so. The stone is said to be of a tasteful character, but the inscription is objected to by the bishop. It runs thus:—

"Of your charity,
Pray for the repose of the soul of William Priestman,
Who departed this life September 6th, 1860,
Aged 62 years. R. I. P.
Eternal rest give to him, &c."

The statute of 1857, which abolished the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in testamentary and matrimonial causes, has left untouched the powers of these Courts in respect of offences that are purely ecclesiastical. The proceedings which may be instituted with regard to this case, therefore, fall under their exclusive cognizance. Two questions arise from the facts we have stated—first, whether the person who erected the stone was guilty of an ecclesiastical offence in having done so without the permission of the rector, even though it should be considered that the stone itself involved no violation of ecclesiastical law; and, secondly, whether the tombstone contains any inscription contrary to the Articles and Canons of the Church of England, which are for certain purposes part of the law of the land. Upon the first question there is no room to doubt that the person who erected the stone is guilty of an ecclesiastical offence—unless he previously obtained the consent of the rector, a presumption which the data before us scarcely warrant us in forming. It is clear enough that a monument cannot be erected in a parish churchyard without the consent of the ordinary or the rector. Although custom is allowed to qualify the rights of the ordinary and rector as to fees, &c., no custom, it would appear, can supersede the necessity of their consent to the erection of a tombstone; (Wats. 39). The common law right of interment does not involve a right to set up a sepulchral monument. The proper mode of obtaining this right is to apply to the ordinary for a faculty for that purpose. The second question which we have stated, and which is entirely independent of any abstract question touching the right to erect tombstones, suggests manifold considerations. The removal of the tombstone can be justified only upon the ground that the prayer for the soul of the deceased, which the inscription requests, involves necessarily the tenet of purgatory. This doctrine must, then, be proved to be so inconsistent with the articles and canons of the Church of England, as that its enunciation by an inscription on a tombstone constitutes an ecclesiastical delict, which may be punished by ecclesiastical censure, and followed by an abatement of the alleged cause of offence. In Breecha v. Woolfrey (Curteis's "Ecclesiastical Reports," p. 880), in which the facts were identical with those we have stated, Sir H. Jenner held that prayer for the dead did not involve necessarily the doctrine of purgatory, and, consequently, that prayer for the dead was not condemned by the Church of England in its renunciation of the doctrine of purgatory. The doctrine of the Church of England, as also the law, applicable to such cases, are to be found chiefly in the 22nd Article, the 35th Article on the Homilies, and the 7th Homily on Prayer. There is no doubt that Bishops Tomline and Taylor, as also Mr. Palmer, the author of the "Origines Liturgicæ," considered that prayer for the dead was not necessarily connected with the doctrine of purgatory. The inscription on the tombstone of Bishop Barrow, in the Cathedral of St. Asaph, favours the same opinion; it runs thus: "O vos, transeuntes in domum Domini, in domum orationis, orate pro conservo vestro, ut inveniat misericordiam in die Domini." Bishop Barrow, perhaps, then may be included in the list of authorities who recognise the distinction between prayer for the dead and purgatory; unless these doctrines are indissolubly connected together, there may be no ground for maintaining that prayer for the dead is contrary to the express teaching of the Church of England as contained in such of the articles and formularies as have obtained the force of law. The Church of England has nowhere in these, the recognised repositories of her doctrines, condemned the practice of prayer for the dead; and this practice is not considered to be connected with any other doctrine, except that of purgatory, against which she has protested. Sir H. Jenner's decision in Breecha v. Woolfrey proceeded upon this principle. It was decided in that case that prayer for the dead is not an ecclesiastical offence according to the Articles and Canons of the Church of England. However, therefore, we may be disposed to question the soundness of the distinction maintained by the eminent religious authorities cited in the case of Breecha v. Woolfrey, the legal bearings of the question must be considered as having been settled by that case.

MR. J. S. MILL ON STATUTE REFORM.

A decade is passing away since a body of the foremost legal men was constituted to set in order the confused mass of written law which is known by the name of the Statutes at Large. The body grew from a board into a commission, then ran all to leaf, and two years ago withered fruitless. Nothing was done. Since the extinction of the Statute Law Commission, the public has heard from time to time from the lips of the Attorney-General in the House of Commons, that three gentlemen of the bar have been appointed to advance the work, in which the great organisation of law lords and notables so signally miscarried. As long back as March, 1860—a season when the financial arrangements for the then coming year were commended by ministerial anticipations held forth to the people's representatives—the Attorney-General announced that these three gentlemen had "made considerable progress" towards an expurgated edition of the statutes. He expressed a hope that he would be able to present to the House during that session a Bill for the purpose of sweeping away from the Statute Book all that upon accurate examination should turn out to be no longer part of the statute law. He further hoped to be able to present to the House, during the year in which he was speaking, an expurgated edition of all the Acts of the present reign. The year 1860 passed, and nothing was done. This session a measure has been introduced, yet not to clear away any thing that turns out to be no longer part of the statutes. The Statute Law Revision Bill purposes only to make an express and specific repeal of Acts and parts of Acts which have ceased to be in force otherwise than by express and specific repeal—that is, Acts already repealed in general terms, Acts virtually repealed, and Acts superseded by later enactments which effect the same purpose. The Bill, then, instead of sweeping away anything, simply ascertains existing repeals. Therefore, as regards the promised clearance, together with the expurgated edition and every part thereof, the legal and lay world must be content to live in the hopes inaugurated above a twelvemonth ago by the confident Attorney-General.

This is not, however, the burden of our complaint today. Believing the work of expurgation to be now really and bona-fide in hand, we should feel disposed rather to censure any rash or specious promise of dispatch, than to grudge the consumption of the time which must intervene, before a thorough sifting of the useless from the useful matter in the Statute Book can be made in a manner to gain the confidence of Parliament. What we do view with regret and blame is, that during the ten years which have passed since this statute question has been taken in hand with more or less apparent sincerity, no effort has been made to put present legislation in any shape that shall fit it for the labours of the expurgator, or the consolidator, or any other operator on the written law, except, possibly, the printer and publisher of it. A large part of each succeeding volume of what are termed the Public General Acts, consists of matter which is of no public general interest. The proportion may not every year be so bad as that noticed in 1857 by Mr. Baines—226 pages of public general law out of above a thousand pages of Acts, to be paid for and waded through in these days of pecuniary and mental pressure; but the bulk of each sessional volume that issues from the Queen's printer's press becomes valueless for the lawyer's purpose by the time that the next session casts a similar burden upon him. All the old evils recur perennially. The phraseology of different Acts continues to be illustrative of the different styles of their authors, rather than of the meaning and intent of the Acts themselves as portions of an integral system of law. Thus a variety of phrases in various Acts express the same idea, and the same phrase, a variety of ideas. There exists ever the same want of arrangement in a Bill of the subjects comprised in it, and of the enactments on each subject. Perhaps we should with greater courtesy say, that the peculiarity of the arrangement, according to the point of view from which the Bill has chanced to be framed, does not cease to be more gratifying to the idiosyncrasy of the framer than to the intellect of the lawyer or the public. Again, no remedy has yet been applied to that other evil which Sir Fitzroy Kelly, in the Select Committee of 1857, well described as one of very great magnitude, the ignorance, or at least the want of familiarity in the framer and introducer of a Bill upon a particular subject, with the existing law, so that he is unaware at the time that he introduces and advocates his Bill, what is its effect upon existing law. Nor up to the present time is uncertainty in any less degree than heretofore thrown over the entire statute book by general and equivocal repeals. General repeal was, we have seen, one of the grounds on which the present Revision Bill has been thought necessary. Yet if our readers will turn to the end of the new Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, they will find after a specification of certain Acts and parts of Acts in a schedule, that "all other Acts or parts of Acts which are inconsistent with this Act, are repealed." Is not, then, this ten year manipulation of the statutes a great costly sham?—when, for 1861, by one Bill the Legislature perversely continues to do the very thing that, for the time past, it professes to remedy by another Bill, as a needful preliminary to expurgation, which after all is itself but a preliminary to consolidation. Can there be any serious meaning in men who thus flourish the axe at the root of an evil in old ground, and the next moment plant the same evil anew in fresh soil? Are they husbandmen or impostors who are plucking at tares with one hand and dropping tare seed with the other?

Impressed with a sense of the mischief that this accumulating disorder must entail upon any continuous attempt to systematise the written law, we took occasion, on the regretted death of Mr. Coulson, and subsequently in December last, to press the necessity of creating some kind of Parliamentary conveyancing staff. At the same time we suggested a further machinery for designing the detail of Bills, with a view to their safe and effectual operation in carrying out the policy originated and sanctioned by the Legislature, and ordered to be embodied in them. There are certainly two distinct duties to be performed in shaping a law, the one the framing of such clauses and the arrangement of them in such a manner as may fit the measure to the circumstances of life under their social as well as under their juridical aspect; the other, the expression of the clauses in language which shall not only be consistent both with itself and with the rest of the Statute Book, but also shall have such clear and careful reference to the existing written and unwritten law as to preclude unexpected conflict with either.

On the present occasion, it is less our object to reiterate our views, than to point out the accordance between them and the opinions expressed by Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his "Considerations of Representative Government." He puts forward his proposition on statute reform largely and boldly as follows:—

"Any Government fit for a high state of civilization would have as one of its fundamental elements a small body, not exceeding in number the members of a cabinet, who should act as a commission of legislation, having for its appointed office to make the laws. If the laws of this country were, as surely they will soon be, revised and put into a connected form, the commission of codification by which this is effected should remain a permanent institution, to watch over the work, protect it from deterioration, and make further improvements as often as required. No one would wish that this body should of itself have any power of enacting laws. The commission would only embody the element of intelligence in their construction; Parliament would represent that of will. No measure would become a law until expressly sanctioned by Parliament; and Parliament, or either House, would have the power not only of rejecting but of sending back a Bill to the commission for reconsideration and improvement. Either House might also exercise its initiative by referring any subject to the commission, with directions to prepare a new law. The commission, of course, would have no power of refusing its instrumentality to any legislation which the country desired. Instructions, concurred in by both Houses, to draw up a Bill which should effect a particular purpose, would be imperative on the commissioners, unless they preferred to resign their office. Once framed, however, Parliament should have no power to alter the measure, but solely to pass or reject it; or, if partially disapproved of, remit it to the commission for reconsideration."

We certainly did not contemplate, as Mr. Mill seems to do, that any initiative in law making should be lodged with either branch of the machinery which we advocated; nor that the ultimate power to alter Bills should be abdicated by the Legislature. And however eminent may be the source of an opinion to the contrary, we do not think it likely that the prospect of any amount of improvement in the embodiment of legislative decrees would induce Parliament, or the country, to confide to any other body than the Lords and Commons the prerogative of bringing forward projects of law. The value of the passage which we have quoted consists in its recognition of the necessity of something more than a statute board to correct such evils as inconsistency or incorrectness of language, illogical arrangement, and ignorance or uncertainty as to the effect of new Acts upon existing law. The settlement of the details of an Act, in such a manner that it may work out effectively and well the policy which dictated it, is an additional matter requiring a special organisation. In fact, there are three constituents of a legislative measure: first, its policy and necessity; secondly, its provisions in detail; and thirdly, its construction and language. The determination of the policy and necessity is essentially the function of the legislative power, and in this country is made by the joint operation of leave to bring in a Bill, and the first and second readings. A committee deals with the details. The construction and language take care of themselves. To these last, as well as to the evils we have noticed above in connection with them, and to the appointment of some board, officer, or machinery for remedying them, the Select Committee of 1857 on the Statute Law Commission gave its more particular attention. But the reformation of the detail work of legislation in committee as distinguished on the one hand from the pure conveyancing in an Act, and on the other from the general imperial sanction of Parliament, has not hitherto received that attention which we have previously solicited and now exhibit from the pages of Mr. John Stuart Mill.

A committee might act as an efficient legislative machinery, if each member felt that the perfecting the measure before it were his personal duty, so that he would be constant in his attendance, full and precise in his knowledge, and habituated to apply it in a scientific manner. Were legislation a pursuit of professional skill and assiduity contracted by life-long devotion, instead of being a vantage ground for political superiority and the promotion of local and personal interest; did each member consider himself under a responsibility, as a national draftsman, similar to that of the late Mr. Coulson as the Government draftsman, the work of such a committee would rise above a well-meant or ill-meant amateur patching. The truth is that legislation at the present time has become of so administrative a character and the affairs which it seeks to regulate have grown so complex and extensive, that a mixed society of gentlemen occupied with their own affairs, and returned to Parliament without the application, either on the hustings or at the table of the House, of any test of their ability to fashion laws, is unfit for the scientific construction of a code. A body of professional law framers, therefore, is required for supplying the provisions necessary to give embodiment to a project of law approved by Parliament. A popular representative body is ill-adapted for any step in legislation beyond giving instructions to draw an Act with all necessary and proper clauses. Out of the body, to be created, of professional law framers, or subordinate to such a body, there would still be required a conveyancing staff, whose speciality would be knowledge and skill in the contents of the Statute Book, in its construction and language, and in the interpretations put upon it by decided cases. Without this knowledge and skill, any hope of a well-ordered code for judicial purposes will be vain; and however much expurgation may reduce the statutes at large, it is plain to all conversant with the subject that such knowledge and skill can be acquired only by men whose lives are given up to the attainment thereof. It is for this reason we consider that a necessity exists for a conveyancing staff as a second body, distinct from that of the professional law framers. The faculty of the one would be technical; the faculty of the other, social and political. Their common characteristic would be that they were "experts."

"WHO SHALL DECIDE WHEN DOCTORS DIS- AGREE?"

The case of the College of Physicians, reported in the present number of the Weekly Reporter, if not of paramount legal importance, will be found to present many points of general interest, and at all events will take rank as one of the great medical causes célèbres. For the particulars we must refer our readers to the report itself. We may state that the contest which was waged by the Apothecaries Society, under the wing of the Attorney-General, against the College of Physicians, arose out of a resolution of the latter body to create a new order of practitioners, armed with the testamur and diploma of the college, and commissioned not only to prescribe, but to administer drugs for gain, contrary to the invariable restriction of the college—a restriction not contained in their charter or statutes, but self-imposed and rigidly acted upon for upwards of three centuries. The apothecaries, resenting this contemplated infringement of their privileges, called upon the Court of Chancery to lay an embargo upon the physicians, and restrain them from granting their letters of marque to these privateers in physic.

The quarrel, as will be seen, was a very pretty quarrel as it stood, and afforded one more example of the odium medicorum, said by some to rival in intensity the odium theologicum. For the contest now raised was not raised for the first time. Before the seventeenth century the apothecaries formed one guild with the grocers. Plums, sugar, spice, Venice treacle, mithridate, and clysters were sold in the same shop. As to their knowledge and skill in physic they stood in hardly any higher estimation than the sorcerers or cunning men of the period. The needy apothecary of Mantua, "in tatter'd weeds," "culling of simples,"

"In his needy shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator stuffed, and other skins
Of ill-shaped fishes; and about his shelves,
A beggarly account of empty boxes," will occur to everyone. But in the reign of James I. a charter was granted raising them to the dignity of a corporation, under the style of "The Master Wardens and Society of the Art and Mystery of Apothecaries of the City of London," and conferring many most important privileges upon them. From this time they appear to have risen in social and medical position. No doubt Burton, writing about 1620, does not spare his girds against the poor apothecary. In his "Anatomy of Melancholy," he speaks of the "knave apothecary," with "his old obsolete doses, adulterine drugs, bad mixtures," &c.; and again, "their art is wholly conjectural, if it be an art, uncertain, imperfect, and got by killing of men; they are a kind of butchers, leeches, menslayers; surgeons and apothecaries especially, that are, indeed, the physicians' hangmen, curufices, and common executioners;" and upon the whole awarding the palm to the hangman for his greater rapidity of execution. But the facts show conclusively that by the end of the seventeenth century, the apothecaries had taken high rank in the medical profession, and were generally consulted in simple cases by all classes, except, perhaps, the most wealthy, who might adhere to the physicians from conservatism or considerations of "respectability." The physicians did not surrender without a struggle the territory which was thus being gradually abstracted from them. They established dispensaries for preparing and distributing medicines to the poor at prices less than those charged by the apothecaries, and attended to give advice gratis. This step of the physicians did not pass unquestioned. Dissensions were raised within the college, and a contest which has found a Homer in Sir Samuel Garth ensued. Many passages from his almost forgotten "Dispensary" might have been cited with singular aptness before Vice-Chancellor Wood:—

"What if we claim their right t' assassinate.
Must they needs turn apothecaries strait?
Prevent it, Gods! All stratagems we try
To crowd with new inhabitants your sky."

In 1703 they asserted their privileges more directly by bringing an action for penalties against Rose, an apothecary, for that he did, "without prescription or advice of a doctor, and without any fee for advice, compound and send to one Seale (a butcher) some boluses as proper for his distemper, only taking the price of his drugs." The case was much litigated, but judgment was ultimately given by the House of Lords in favour of the apothecary against the College of Physicians. After this decision the apothecaries appear to have enjoyed without further question the right of prescribing as well as supplying medicines. In 1815 the Apothecaries Act was passed providing for their education, and assigning to them their definite province in the profession, though the Act did not in terms abrogate the supremacy of the physicians over the whole domain of physic. After the Medical Act of 1858, the preamble of which simply stated that it was expedient "that persons requiring medical aid should be enabled to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners," the physicians, with a view to regaining their ancient privileges, promulgated the scheme which has been attacked by the present information. In addition to the fellows and licentiates of the college who are to be restricted as formerly against the practice of pharmacy, or supplying of medicines for profit, it is proposed to create a new body of licentiates to be approved by examination, twenty-one years old, and not to be restricted by any bye-law from supplying medicines to patients under their own care. The apothecaries rose in arms against this scheme, which they represented by their information as contrary to law, beyond the power and authority of the physicians, and an invasion of the rights and privileges of the apothecaries. In support of their case they appealed to the Medical Act of 1858 as defining and "stereotyping" the status of medical practitioners of whatever qualification. Physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries, were to continue for all time in that state in which the Act of 1858 found them. Nothing was to be added to, nothing abated from, their several privileges or restrictions. If the College of Physicians, though armed with the most ample authority over the whole domain of Physic, had for some two or three centuries past left to the "needy apothecary" the low mechanical act of compounding and vending for lucre his "electuaries, elegnias, cataplasms, aurum potabile," and the like; the faculty, it was contended, had departed from the physicians and passed to the apothecaries, no longer poor starveling squatters upon the domain of physic, but a recognised medical corporation, with chartered privileges and rights to vindicate. However unlimited in their origin the privileges of the college, those privileges were to be limited to the exact measure of their exercise at the period when the Act was passed: and this without reference to the circumstance that the restriction had emanated from the college from within, rather than been imposed by royal or parliamentary authority from without. In other words, the college was thenceforth to be for ever precluded from modifying or repealing its own bye-laws. Nor did the apothecaries rest their case upon the Act of 1858 alone. According to their construction of the Apothecaries' Act, 1815, the faculty of licensing practitioners who should with the same hand prescribe and supply medicines, was definitely transferred from the physicians and granted to the apothecaries; and notwithstanding the clause saving the rights, &c., of the College of Physicians, a licentiate of the College would be liable, no less than any layman, to the penalties imposed by the Act, if he should "act or practise as an apothecary." In his argument in support of the information, the Attorney-General called upon the Court to restrain the physicians from thus resuming their disused privileges, and urged that their project would be a fraud upon the legislative provisions of 1815 and 1858, and also a public injury—"These be bitter words, Mr. Attorney—" upon her Majesty's lieges, by endangering their health, and driving them to seek their drugs at the hands of raw and inexperienced youths, who have not been subjected to the searching tests exacted by the sages of Blackfriars.

The length to which our sketch of the rise and progress of the dispute has extended, leaves us but little space for any lengthened comment upon the decision of the case or its legal bearings. In a judgment characterised by all his accustomed ability, and by more than his wonted force and precision, V.C. Wood unhesitatingly affirmed the authority of the college against the attack of the apothecaries. His Honour rested his decision upon the broad, general principle that a corporation with chartered and statutory rights and privileges could only be deprived of them by express enactment; and that the repeal must be no less explicit than the grant. That the college had power originally to grant licences for the practice of physic unfettered by any restriction against the supply of drugs he had no doubt. The effect of the original charter was to vest in the college the control over the universal medical science and the right to grant such licences, restricted or unrestricted, existed beyond question up to the time of James I., and was in no way affected by the charter granted to the apothecaries in that reign. Whether the Act of 1815 abrogated that right was a question that might admit of doubt, though he did not himself feel any. At all events, the repeal, if repeal there was, was only by inference, while the clause saving the ancient rights, &c., of the college was express. The point was too doubtful for the interference brevis manu of a court of equity, and the apothecaries might well be left to try the question at law. But whatever doubts might arise upon the Act of 1815, none could reasonably be suggested by that of 1858. There was nothing to show the slightest intention to deprive any one of the medical bodies of their power to alter their bye-laws so long as they kept within the limits of their charters. Assuming that they had each the power of regulating and imposing restrictions upon the practice of their own members, the power of relaxing those restrictions, as occasion might require, remained untouched. It might be urged, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas, and that the college was not entitled to resume an authority disused and repudiated for centuries, to the detriment of their neighbours who had gradually acquired an adverse title. But the answer, we apprehend, would be that the act of the physicians was not aggressive. In regulating the position of young men enrolling themselves within their order, and submitting to their educational tests they simply wished to remove certain restrictions formerly imposed, but no longer considered expedient. If in the result the public may prefer to receive advice and physic from the licentiates of the college rather than of the hall, that is no ground for the interference of a court of equity. Let the hall turn out a better and cheaper article than the college, and they will command the market. Any attempt, however, to create a monopoly in a trading corporation, to the exclusion of a scientific body formerly in the enjoyment, and never legitimately deprived of, the right, can hardly succeed. Of still less force is the somewhat unintelligible appeal to the Court to interpose on behalf of the public. The public health will probably not suffer by being entrusted to a body of men whose qualifications have been rigidly tested by one of the most competent medical boards in Europe. At any rate, we may safely be left to choose for ourselves in the matter. A point which was urged in favour of the physicians, but not dwelt upon in the judgment, was, that if the apothecaries were right in their contest, their remedy, by their own showing, was not in equity, but by action at law for penalties under the Act of 1815, to which, as the information stated, the new licentiates would render themselves liable. But this is a minor point not necessary for decision in the view taken by his Honour. In that view, based, we apprehend, upon the soundest principles, and not the less sound from their simplicity, we entirely concur. Whether the result of the decision will be to reduce the apothecaries to their ancient function of mere drug-sellers, and reinstate the physicians in their supremacy over the whole domain of physic, is a question not within our province: we leave the discussion to the doctors, the solution to the public.

As laymen, however, we see no reason to regret the conclusion, believing as we do that the education of our medical practitioners will be best entrusted to a learned and scientific body, which has exercised its high functions with honour and distinction to itself and the public good of the commonwealth for more than three centuries.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE COURTS OF CHANCERY AND PROBATE.

The Court of Chancery and the Ecclesiastical Courts alike derived almost the entire of their jurisprudence from the Roman Civil Law. Both classes of courts also owed their establishment and perpetuation to a common cause—the rigour of the Common Law in its definition of the rights of property, and its want of rules as to personal status. The Chancellor, moreover, as a general rule, was a clergyman, and a judge in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The administration and procedure, as well as the origin, of both judicatures were thus very similar. The chief distinction between them was that Courts of Equity dealt only with questions relating to rights of property or to personal rights as connected with claims to property, while the Ecclesiastical Courts adjudicated directly upon questions of kindred, marriage, and personal or ecclesiastical status. Each judicature endeavoured to confine itself within the boundary especially marked out for it by the theory of its constitution. But it became impossible that this theoretical distinctness could be completely observed. The Chancellor had not, indeed, the same motive to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts as he had to enter upon the province of the Common Law judges. Yet, in cases in which the Court of Chancery had concurrent jurisdiction with the Ecclesiastical Courts, suitors naturally resorted to that court in which they were certain of obtaining complete justice. In cases of bequests clothed with trusts, or given to married women or children, the Court of Chancery acquired an exclusive jurisdiction. The Ecclesiastical Courts having been thus gradually shorn of their domain, were finally deprived of the remnant of their original power as to testamentary causes by the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77. This statute, which entirely abolished the testamentary jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, transferred only the right of granting probate or letters of administration to the new Court of Probate. The 23rd section of this statute provides that no suits for legacies or distribution of residues be instituted in the Court of Probate. These cases are left, as before the Act, to be adjudicated upon by the Court of Chancery, by the county courts if the legacy be under £20, or by the superior courts of law if the legacy be a specific one to which the executor has assented. The Court of Probate thus administers the jurisdiction previously exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts as to the granting of probate or letters of administration. The great bulk of this business is, indeed, of a non-contentious nature, and may, therefore, be administered by any court which has machinery proper for the purpose. But the contentious business in such causes should naturally be deemed an adjunct of the jurisdiction which determines the rights to the property in dispute.

This was the principle on which Lord Cranworth in his speech* on introducing his Court of Probate Bill, in 1857, recommended that legislation regarding testamentary matters should proceed. The difference between the laws of wills of personal and of real property, until the 1 Vict. c. 26, helped to maintain the distinctness of the Ecclesiastical Courts, as these adjudicated only upon questions relating to personal property, while the Court of Chancery had to adjudicate both upon claims to real and personal property; the validity of a will relating to real estate being determined by an issue sent by that court to a court of law. Moreover, the ultimate appeal from the Ecclesiastical Courts lay to the Privy Council, while that from the Courts of Chancery or of common law lay to the House of Lords. A common object of all the Bills on this subject was to abolish a multiplicity of testamentary courts, there being no less than 386 of them in active operation down to the passing of the Court of Probate Act. But, we may ask, why should even two distinct testamentary courts be maintained to the obvious inconvenience of suitors? The Ecclesiastical Commissioners of 1832 recommended that testamentary jurisdiction should be vested in the Prerogative Courts of Canterbury and York, or in the former court alone. The Real Property Commissioners of 1833 preferred the Court of Chancery for this purpose. Both classes of commissioners concurred in recommending that such jurisdiction should be exercised by a single tribunal. Lord St. Leonards, and Lord Campbell, in 1854, supported Lord Cranworth's "Bill to transfer the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate to the Court of Chancery." Thirteen commissioners had been appointed to consider the subject; eight approved of the transfer to the Court of Chancery; four wished to confine the business to a single branch of that court, as proposed by Lord Cranworth's Bill; and four recommended the present system, which was the one contemplated in a Bill introduced by Lord Brougham about twenty years before. A complete consolidation of the testamentary courts with the courts of common law has had no advocates. These courts have no machinery for transacting the non-contentious business, which consists of ninety-nine out of every hundred cases. But the contentious and non-contentious cases should be disposed of by the same tribunal; inasmuch as a non-contentious case may unexpectedly become disputed.

The claims of the Court of Chancery to be constituted such tribunal are manifold, and, we think, conclusive. It is the court in which questions arising on the construction of wills are determined, and in which the estates of deceased persons are administered. The right to probate itself sometimes depends upon a question of construction. Thus if a person propound an instrument as testamentary, or if another party oppose the granting of probate of such instrument, the Court must decide the rights of the parties to propound or oppose, and this right may be claimed under the instrument in question. Again, the total or partial revocation of one instrument by another, depends upon the construction put upon both instruments. The Ecclesiastical Courts used sometimes to get out of this difficulty in a very inconvenient manner, by admitting to probate a number of papers which could not stand together, and leaving the Court of Chancery to deal with them. The importance of the judgment of the Court of Chancery in such cases is, surely, not to be overlooked, especially as, one way or another, a litigated will is sure to come before it.

The report of the Chancery Commission of 1854, however, ignores all these arguments. Yet it advised that the Court of Probate, the establishment of which it recommended, should take evidence according to the Chancery system, which was then regulated according to the recommendations contained in the first report of the same commissioners, and that an appeal should lie from the Probate Court to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. The Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill of Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir Richard Bethell, in 1855, provided that the practice of the Courts which it proposed to establish should be similar to that of the Court of Chancery. The Bill introduced by the same law officers in 1856 actually proposed to vest in "The Testamentary Court" which it contemplated, equal jurisdiction with that of the Court of Chancery as to the construction of wills, and the rights of parties claiming under the same and as to the administration of the estates of deceased persons; but that its mode of procedure should be in conformity with that of the superior courts of common law. Now, the chief objections to the Ecclesiastical Courts were founded upon their procedure and mode of taking evidence, which was entirely in accordance with the old chancery system of examination by written interrogatories. These courts were thus without the means of observing the demeanour of a witness; and when questions arose as to the sanity of a testator, or the degree of influence alleged to have been exercised over him—questions the most important of any in this branch of their jurisdiction, and which can be resolved only upon evidence of numerous facts—their conduct of the inquiry was, to use a phrase of Lord Bacon, mera palpato. To have united the Court of Probate, then, even in 1857, with the Court of Chancery, was regarded by the House of Commons as a perpetuation, and not a removal, of the abuses which had prevailed in the Ecclesiastical Courts. It was thus resolved on finally, contrary to the main current of authority, to constitute the new court of probate on a common law basis. The present state of our equity system, however, sufficiently provides for all the common law affinities of cases which come more directly under its own supervision. The reforms of the court since the period when the abolition of the Ecclesiastical Courts was first resolved upon, are too numerous to detail. The masters' offices have been abolished. The system of taking evidence has been remodelled. The court is, in short, the Court of Chancery, as known to the non-legal public, only in name. Lord Cranworth stated in 1854, that speedy process could then be as readily obtained in the Court of Chancery as in the Courts at Westminster. We need not say that the former court has since that date still more clearly justified that statement. If a case continue for twenty or thirty years in chancery, it is because the matter relates to a trust which is to be administered, and not adjudicated upon. In such a case the court is acting as an agent or trustee; and if it had abdicated these functions before an infant, for instance, attained his majority, or any other stated contingency happened, it would cease to carry out the wishes of the person who had left his property charged with such a trust. It might perhaps be inconvenient that the testamentary business should be spread through all the branches of the court; but that is a matter of arrangement which can be easily provided for.

The onus of proof always lies on those who advocate the administration of the law in distinct channels. They should show either an inherent discrepancy between courts which are sought to be amalgamated, or that the conjoint amount of their business would exceed the capacity of a single tribunal to dispatch. But even this latter plea would only show the necessity of attending to the question of judicial strength. An incongruity in the business being administered by a single tribunal should be shown to exist. This, for instance, is the position assumed by those who object to the fusion of law and equity. But, as we have shown, the Court of Chancery and the Ecclesiastical Courts, which the Court of Probate represents, have had a kindred origin, and both adopted their rules for determining degrees of kindred, &c., as also a large portion of their general jurisprudence, from the civil and the canon law. The origin of a law or judicature affords a good index of the direction in which a reform, if otherwise desirable, may very safely proceed; and the consolidation of a judicature with other tribunals which have had a like origin, cannot lead to those anomalous results which hasty innovation readily begets. The Court of Probate is presided over by a judge who has also to administer the vast and progressively increasing business of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The Court of Probate alone has not sufficient business to occupy fully the time of a single judge. It may, therefore, be conveniently amalgamated with another tribunal. But the Divorce Court, besides possessing no affinity in principle with the Court of Probate, presents, by reason of its enormous business, an insuperable objection to the continuance of the present junctions of these courts. The Court of Chancery is, on the other hand, the very judicature the state of the business in which admits of the Court being invested with additional functions. The similarity of the administrative functions of the Ecclesiastical Courts and of the Court of Chancery rendered the changes effected by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 79 easy of practical accomplishment. If, therefore, general expediency requires that the whole business of the Court of Probate should be transferred to the equity courts, we need not apprehend that any difficulty can much impede the realization of such a measure.

Every court should doubtless be constituted so as to be capable of affording complete justice to its suitors. The insufficiency of a court of law in this respect has been the foundation of a great portion of that equity jurisdiction, which has been found most salutary in its results. A court which only affords an imperfect remedy, or is dependant for its action upon proceedings that must be conducted before another tribunal, over which it has no control, is necessarily inadequate to its natural object, and is embarrassed in those cases in which a resort must be had to the collateral judicature. The Legislature, therefore, has endeavoured by means of the Common Law Procedure Acts to preclude in very many cases the necessity of a defendant in an action at law having recourse to equity for the establishment of his defence. The Chancery Amendment Act, 13 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 62, has e converso enabled the Court to determine certain rights without requiring the parties to proceed at law, as they should have done prior to that period. The 39th section of the same Act has a like object in view, in enabling the Court to require the production and oral examination of any witness or party in the cause. By the 61st section, the Court is prohibited from sending a case for the opinion of a court of law—the protracted and complex litigation arising from the dependence of a suit upon the combined action of wholly distinct judicatures having been found more onerous than any refined adjustment of rights could compensate for. The 44th section has given the Court an absolute discretion to proceed in "any suit or other proceeding" in the absence of a personal representative to a deceased person who is interested in the matters in question, or to appoint a representative for the purposes of the suit. This section was suggested by the inconvenience of a resort to another court in cases in which the interest of the deceased might not have been the main subject matter of the suit, or might have been in itself of trivial value. The 49th section of the same Act empowers the Court in cases in which there has been a misjoinder of plaintiffs, "and the plaintiff having an interest shall have died, leaving a plaintiff on the record without an interest," to order at the hearing of the case that it stand revived as may appear just, whereupon the Court may proceed to a decision, if it shall see fit. These sections have all had the common object of avoiding the necessity of a resort to another court. The raising a representative is often, except for the purposes of a chancery suit, altogether unnecessary. But the Court will not exercise the discretion given it by the 44th section, so as to dispense with a representative being raised to a deceased person, if the object of the suit be to administer the assets of such deceased; Abrey v. Newman, 10 Hare 58; Long v. Stone, 1 Kay App. 12; nor if the representative would have the duties of a trustee to perform, Fowler v. Bayldon, 9 Hare 28. The discretion which the Court exercises under this section is, therefore, of a very limited nature, and does not render the appointment of a legal personal representative in very many cases less necessary than it was before the passing of the Act. Much of the inconvenience attendant upon the raising of a personal representative would, doubtless, be obviated, if the appointment could in all cases be made by the Court of Chancery.

The isolation of the Court of Probate is open to a special objection, by reason of its want of any appellate tribunal, except the House of Lords. The misdirection of a Common Law judge may be subjected to a revision both by the Court in Banco, and by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, before the appellant can go to the House of Lords. Not so in the Court of Probate; an appellant goes before the House of Lords per saltum in all cases of appeals, whether these be taken to interlocutory or final decrees. Yet this inconvenience could not be well avoided, unless the Court were constituted a branch either of Chancery or of Common Law judicature. The Chancery Commissioners of 1854 had stated that the Ecclesiastical Courts were not occupied in contentious business for more than sixty days in the year. The establishment of a distinct Court of Probate was, therefore unnecessary. But, unfortunately, it was united to a court, with the judicial principles of which it had little affinity. In 1857, at the time of the discussion of the Court of Probate Act, both Sir Richard Bethell and Sir Fitzroy Kelly continued to approve the principle involved in the Bill of the previous year, viz.; that a Court of Probate, to be efficient, should have power to construe the terms of all wills, to determine the rights of devisees and legatees, and to administer the estates of intestates. They differed, however, upon important questions of detail, and Sir Fitzroy Kelly finally succeeded in having a Court established, according to his views, upon a Common Law basis, as regards the taking of evidence, and calling in the aid of a jury, when necessary. These are characteristics which are, doubtless, most commendable. The equity features of testamentary causes should not, however, have been overlooked. Some of the most intricate questions as to probate arise in cases in which undue influence is alleged to have been exercised upon a testator, and such questions have been always deemed to be of an equitable character; while the administration of assets, whether testamentary or commercial, has likewise been deemed an adjunct of equitable judicature, the interests of very numerous litigants being generally involved in such causes.

It is a manifest anomaly that the Court of Chancery has to determine the right to property, while the Court of Probate determines the right to administration. The establishment of a court distinct from the Courts of Equity is to be attributed partly to the desire which prevailed in 1857 of getting rid of every thing that sounded as different from common law—so far as probate and letters of administration were concerned—owing to the great disfavour into which the ecclesiastical courts had fallen; and partly to the unpopular character which the Court of Chancery bore down to a very recent date. When the Court of Probate Act was passed, the practical merits of the then recent chancery reforms were not yet fully known and appreciated; but at the present date no objection can be urged to the principles or procedure of the Court of Chancery that can outweigh its claims to a plenary testamentary jurisdiction. It was apprehended in 1857, that the Court of Probate, if constituted a court of construction and administration, might in its decisions conflict with the Court of Chancery. A much stronger objection to such a measure, we think, is to be found in the establishment of two distinct sets of courts, adjudicating upon the very same rights, even though these should always agree in their decisions. It is on this principle we ask at present of what use is it that a legatee should be compelled to resort to one court for letters of administration, and to another for administration itself; or why should not a court which is deemed competent to construe a will for one purpose, be deemed equally competent to construe the same will for all other purposes? The Ecclesiastical Courts had enjoyed the right to confer administration only because they possessed jurisdiction to determine the rights of parties to the property, and, in fact, had, in the person of the ordinary, constructive possession of the goods of the deceased until administration was granted. The accessory, then, should not be any longer left separated from the principal; and as it is an impossibility, against which we need not argue, that jurisdiction as to property should be conferred upon the Court of Probate, it only remains that the power to grant probate and letters of administration should be vested in the Court of Chancery, either simpliciter, or in a branch of that court exclusively assigned to the adjudication of testamentary causes.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

May 10.—Arber v Carrington.—A compromise having been suggested by the Court in this case, the plaintiff's counsel wished the case to stand over for an hour, in order that he might see his clients; but

Mr. Justice CROMPTON said counsel were bound to exercise their discretion; and, in the absence of express instructions, it was their duty to do the best they could for their clients. If they did not do so, and the client had to submit to worse terms, he would have a right to complain of his counsel, just as a patient would of his surgeon if he did not do what was necessary.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN.)

May 15.—It was stated to-day that Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., had presented a petition under the 7 & 8 Vict., and that Mr. Patrick Johnson was appointed assignee in the matter. The petition being under the private arrangement clauses any further mention of the case would be misplaced.

Mr. Fredk. Dimsdale, solicitor, King's-arms-yard, was awarded a third-class certificate. The bankrupt had become involved in the mania which existed some years ago for Westminster Improvement Bonds.

The following gentlemen were called to the bar in Easter Term. Inner Temple, viz.: Henry Pottinger, Esq., B.A.; John Hardy, jun., Esq.; Philippe Gaston Martin Moncamp, Esq.; Charles Boyle, Esq.; James Jephson, Esq.; William Potter, jun., Esq., B.A.; and William Roupell, Esq., M.P.

NEW TRIALS IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

Mr. BUTT, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that as he understood the measure was to be opposed by the Home Secretary, it would be more convenient then to state its provisions, together with the grounds on which they were supported. The question as to the necessity of instituting some tribunal to review erroneous verdicts in criminal cases was not new to that House. Early in the present century Sir S. Romilly introduced a Bill identical in principle with the one now under consideration, and the proposal had been frequently revived in Parliament by others at intervals throughout the intervening period. In 1858 the hon. and learned member for Wexford and himself, acting in concert, brought forward a similar measure, the principle of which was affirmed by a vote of 145 to 91, although it unfortunately was not allowed to become law. The present Bill embodied various suggestions thrown out in the course of previous debates. It sought to make no innovation in the law and constitution. New trials were now granted in certain class of criminal cases. The object of this Bill was to render that remedy more general, and extend it to cases in which, above all others, it was most needed. The judgments of inferior courts were now liable to be reviewed upon writ of error by the Court of Queen's Bench; but that remedy was reduced to a mere matter of form, and did not touch the substantial miscarriages of justice which sometimes took place. Proceedings could also be removed from inferior tribunals to the Court of Queen's Bench upon writs of certiorari. Moreover, convictions for misdemeanour before the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench and a Middlesex jury could be set aside either upon points of law or fact. If, however, the conviction was one for felony, no new trial could be obtained, on account of an absurd and unreasonable distinction which ought not in these days to be maintained. Surely, if a new trial was given, where the penalty was fine or imprisonment, it ought not to be denied where the punishment was death or transportation; more especially as in the trial of the two cases the tribunal was the same and the rules of evidence also the same. This Bill therefore proposed to remove that anomaly by granting to prisoners tried and convicted of felony in the Court of Queen's Bench the same right of appeal as was enjoyed by persons convicted of misdemeanour. It also proposed to extend the writ of certiorari to cases in which it was not now usual to grant it, and to enable the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a proper case being made, to send that writ to any court of criminal jurisdiction in the kingdom in order to have its verdict reviewed. Everybody must feel that there were instances in which it was most desirable that there should be an opportunity of having the judgment of a criminal court reviewed, not by the discretion of the Secretary of State, but by a judicial tribunal administering the law upon settled principles. He knew that it would be said that the discretion of the Secretary of State to grant pardons supplied the place of a power of appeal; but he would ask, was it right that an innocent man should be placed in the position of a pardoned criminal? and also, was it right that the Secretary of State in his private office, should alone have the power of reviewing a sentence? It might also be urged that erroneous convictions were very few, but he doubted much whether they were not far more numerous than was generally supposed; for at present there were no means for an improperly convicted person to obtain a re-hearing. He might be asked whether he intended to give a power of appeal in cases of acquittal. He did not propose to give such a power, and at present the Home Secretary could only pardon—he could not hang a man whom the jury had acquitted. He thought that both experience and authority were in favour of the Bill which he now asked the House to read a second time.

Sir G. LEWIS said that last session this Bill had undergone a full discussion, and was then negatived without a division, and he really thought, after that circumstance, it was hardly necessary to introduce this session substantially the same Bill. The object of the measure was to make the trials of all treasons and felonies removable by certiorari, and to give power to the superior Courts of granting new trials. That was the principle of the Bill of last session, and no fresh light had been thrown on the subject by the speech of the hon. and learned member, or by the provisions of the measure itself. There was a general tendency in our laws to favour the prisoner, but if such a step were taken as was now proposed, the inevitable result would be to diminish that merciful and forbearing feeling which was now an honourable distinction of our criminal law. The real question was, whether they could assimilate the civil and criminal law by giving a prisoner power to appeal in cases of treason and felony. The hon. member said he wished to assimilate felonies with misdemeanours; but that involved the whole question in dispute. At present the power of appeal was only exercised when persons had the means of paying costs. The appeal given by the Bill would be a mere mockery unless a prisoner had the means of paying the costs; and it would be necessary to saddle the public with the costs of all second trials. Unless that were done the Bill would be mere waste paper; and if the costs of the second trial were paid by the public every prisoner would appeal, on the chance of obtaining an acquittal from the first conviction. He was far from saying that Secretaries of State were infallible, but he believed every precaution was taken to avoid error in their decisions. The judges were consulted, and every statement and representation was carefully considered; and it should be recollected that courts of appeal would themselves be liable to error. No alteration of the law would secure an absolutely infallible authority. He concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. M'MANON said he had introduced a similar measure on previous occasions, but he thought it useless to occupy the House with the Bill while parties remained in their present position; but he still thought it an anomalous and unjustifiable proceeding that a Secretary of State should set aside the verdict of a jury.

Mr. BUTT having briefly replied,
The amendment was agreed to without a division.
The Bill was therefore lost.

EQUITY.

LIABILITY OF WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE TO DEBTS.

It appeared from our previous investigation of this subject that a married woman's separate estate is liable to her debts, but that the question is still to some extent unsettled what are the debts to which it is liable; and we adverted to another open question of, at least, equal difficulty, viz., what is the separate estate to which this liability attaches. This latter question may be illustrated by reference to the case of Owens v. Dickinson, which was fully stated in our former article. In that case, real estate was settled to such uses as a married woman should by deed or writing or by will from time to time appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for her separate use for life, with remainder to the use of her son by a former marriage. Now, supposing the married woman to have incurred such a liability as would affect separate estate, the question would be, whether the life estate only, or the fee, would be affected by it? The principle upon which this liability was either introduced or has been maintained is, that the separate estate is the creature of equity, and as equity had conferred on the married woman the privileges, it would also impose upon her the responsibilities, of a feme sole. But if real estate is settled to such uses as a married woman shall appoint, her power of appointment is recognised, not only in equity, but at law. She enjoys no special protection from equity in the exercise of this power, and why, therefore, it may be asked, should equity assume to control her in the exercise of it? And if equity does assume this control, why should it not do so in the married woman's life, just as well as after her death, instead of holding, as it appears to do, that the corpus of the property cannot be affected during her life, but only her life interest. It would seem that the term "separate property" ought to be restricted to property which might be enjoyed and disposed of by the husband, if equity did not interfere for the wife's protection; and if the term were thus restricted, a power given to the wife, not being exercisable by the husband, would not be included in it. However, this distinction between power and property, whether it was or was not practicable to have maintained it, does not appear to have been maintained. Lord Justice Turner says in the judgment which has suggested these remarks:

"In cases where the power has been by deed, or writing, or will, the Courts have certainly held the corpus of the property to be subject to the debts and engagements of married women, although it is to be observed that during the life of the married woman the Court has never gone farther than to affect the limited interest." If we look at the authorities on which the Lord Justice founded this statement of the law we shall find that the latest of them—viz., Owens v. Dickinson, scarcely seems to go to the full extent of his proposition. In that case, as we have seen, there was a power of appointment over the fee, and in exercise of that power the married woman charged the estate with the payment of her debts. Lord Cottenham held that the plaintiff's demand, which arose on a written instrument, was a debt of the married woman; and there can be no doubt that if the demand had accrued during the married woman's life, it would have been capable of being enforced against her separate life estate. So far the case came within the undisputed limits of this doctrine; but the life estate was at an end, and the fee charged with debts had been appointed. Lord Cottenham held that this debt of the married woman was payable after her death out of what he called her separate property; but he did not say that it was in respect of the character of separate property that the estate became liable to the debt, and it can hardly be inferred from his judgment that, if there had been no charge of debts, he would have held the estate liable in the hands of the wife's appointee, merely because she had incurred a liability capable of affecting her proper separate estate; but unless this inference can be drawn, Lord Cottenham's judgment does not support in its full extent the doctrine stated by Lord Justice Turner. It may, of course, be said that a married woman cannot properly be spoken of as having debts, unless with reference to separate estate; but it does not follow, from this observation, that the fund out of which those debts are paid is necessarily separate estate. It may deserve notice that the confusion between power and property, under which this subject seems to labour, arose almost inevitably out of the fluctuations of opinion as to the true foundation of the entire doctrine. The Court felt, in several cases, a natural desire that married women who had, in the eye of the world, property, should be compelled to satisfy the expectations of those who had trusted them on the footing of it. Hence came the notion that bonds, bills, &c., might be treated as informal exercises of the power of appointment which was frequently combined with a life estate for separate use. But, besides other objections to this notion, it was of course inapplicable to cases where there was a mere life estate without any power. Of late years the doctrine has been rested upon the principle that separate estate is the creature of equity, which equity may claim to deal with as it sees fit. As soon as this ground was taken up, the argument arose upon which we have above insisted, viz., that a power of appointment may be legal, and even if it is equitable, it does not owe its validity to any special favour shown by equity to married women, and therefore there is, so to speak, no consideration for the charge of the married woman's debts which is sought to be imposed on the property in the hands of her appointees.

The earlier cases cited by Lord Justice Turner are not an inviting subject of discussion, partly because some of them are briefly and we might even say obscurely worded, and partly because we see that with the lapse of time the doctrine of the Court has undergone so much modification that it may well be doubted whether decisions of the last century can be entirely relied upon as authorities. We believe that the question to which we have adverted, whether property over which a married woman has a present power of appointment ought to be considered as property settled to her separate use, would be answered by some, at least, of the present judges in the negative. But formerly there were judges who felt a difficulty in conceiving the existence of separate estate, or at least in attaching to it a liability, in any other way than by supposing it to involve a power. It seems strange that the bonds and notes of a married woman should have been supposed to affect her separate estate as informal appointments, and yet that the Court should have refused to allow the liability which it thus created to attach during the married woman's life-time, to the corpus of the estate settled to her separate use. If she was to be considered as having appointed her estate to creditors, surely the constructive appointment ought to have extended to whatever estate, whether for life or in fee, she possessed power to appoint. However, the Court declined to follow its own notion of an informal appointment to what appears to be its logical result, and now that notion has been exploded. As we have seen, a disposition now prevails to rest the liability of the separate estate to debts on the ground of the protection which the wife receives from equity in respect of this estate against her husband. If this view be finally adopted it would seem to follow that the liability should attach only on that in respect of which the protection is received. Perhaps it may be possible by steadily carrying out the principle here suggested to bring this entire branch of equitable doctrine into a clearer and more satisfactory shape than that in which it now appears. We may instance as an example of that kind of growth of this head of law which we think goes far to supersede the early cases, that formerly it was thought that personalty could be settled absolutely to separate use, but that realty could be so settled only for the married woman's life; and if it was intended that she should be able to dispose of realty as against her heir, it was thought necessary to give her a power of appointment. At the present day, however, we should suppose that realty as well as personalty could be settled absolutely for separate use, and this is the opinion of Mr. Lewin, who says, at p. 645 of his "Treatise on Trusts," that he presumes that if lands be conveyed to a trustee and his heirs upon trust as to the fee simple for a feme covert "for her separate use," she may deal with the fee as if she were a feme sole. Mr. Lewin thinks, however, that the point is not free from doubt; and even supposing it to be settled, the remark is obvious that the distinction between a power to appoint the fee and a capacity conferred by equity to convey the fee is little more than nominal. A separate estate in fee in realty wants that which we have ventured to point out as the essential characteristic of separate estate—viz., liability to be disposed of by the husband unless equity interfered for the wife's protection. The husband's right to the enjoyment of his wife's estate in fee does not extend, even at law, beyond his wife's and his own life.

In considering how far a married woman's engagements would affect the corpus of property settled to her separate use for life with a power of appointment over the corpus, Lord Justice Turner classed the cases under three heads:—"First, where the power of appointment has been general, by deed, or writing, or by will; secondly, where it has been by will only, and the power has been exercised; thirdly, where there has been a limitation in default of appointment exercised." We could have wished that this classification had been expressed in terms a little more precise. We should like, for instance, to be more certainly informed whether the third class includes all cases of power, whether by deed, or writing, or will, or by will only, in which the power is followed by a limitation in default. It happens, unfortunately, that in giving an example to illustrate his meaning the Lord Justice appears to have mistaken the name of the case he intended to quote. He says, however, that, in cases falling under the third class, the debts and engagements of the married woman cannot prevail against the parties entitled in default of appointment; and, therefore, this class of cases, if we knew the limits of it, might be dismissed from further consideration. In cases falling under the second class, where the power of appointment is by will only, and has been exercised, but not for creditors, the Lord Justice says that the authorities are inconsistent, and he considers the point as open. The modern authorities to which he refers are a mere dictum of his own on one side, and the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in Vaughan v. Vanderstegen (2 Drew. 165; s. c. 2 W. R. 293), on the other. As this judgment discusses the whole question of the difference between power and separate estate in a very clear and complete manner, we cannot do better than devote the short remainder of our space to it.

We referred in our former article to that part of this judgment which dealt with the question whether the separate estate of a married woman was liable to her general engagements, and we showed that Vice-Chancellor Kindersley had anticipated the conclusion which has now been arrived at by Lord Justice Turner. Having reached this point, his Honour goes on to say that the efficacy of those engagements of the married woman as debts must be confined within the same limits which circumscribe her character of feme sole, that is, within the extent of her separate use. To go beyond that limit would be a violation of all principle. The question then arose, whether a married woman, in the view of a court of equity, was a feme sole as to a general power of appointment of which she was the donee. It will be observed that this is the very question which we suggested in considering the case of Owens v. Dickinson. His Honour asks whether the married woman was enabled to execute a power of appointment on the ground that the property comprised in the power was separate estate. The answer is, clearly not. "It was true a general power enabled a disposition independent of the husband, and so far resembled separate use; but it could not be the same thing, being the creature of a court of law as much as of equity. In truth, the difference between a trust for separate use, and a power to a married woman, was the same as between property and power." His Honour then applied the principle he had laid down to the case before him, which was that of a power to appoint by will. The married woman had a life interest in leaseholds and personalty to her separate use, and a general power by will over the reversion expectant on her own death, which power she had exercised. "The trust for separate use affected only the life estate, and she was so far a feme sole in a court of equity . . . but as the separate use was confined to the life estate, so also was her capacity of contracting debts." As the creditors had no right, even in equity, to resort to any estate except such as was settled on an express trust for separate use, they could not come on the reversion; and it was therefore impossible to apply to this case the same rule of equity as in the case of a man, or a feme sole, exercising a general power, and to make the appointed property liable for debts.

We have already treated at considerable length the first of Lord Justice Turner's classes—viz., that of cases where the power is by deed or writing, or by will. There might, however, be a great deal yet to say, if space permitted, on the varieties of this class of cases according to the different nature of the limitations in default of appointment exercised. The more the subject is considered, the more uncertainty appears in it. On the whole, we are inclined to think that certainty cannot be attained unless by the general application of the principle on which Vice-Chancellor Kindersley decided the above case of the second class.

COMMON LAW.

Agacio v. Forbes, (P. C.) 9 W. R. 503.

The question which must be determined at the very outset of every action—viz., by and against whom it is to be brought—has become, by the effect of recent changes in the law, of somewhat less vital importance than formerly. This is so because a mistake may now be amended on equitable terms without the necessity of recommencing the proceedings; and, indeed, by the Procedure Act of last session the joinder of too many persons as plaintiffs has become immaterial, except so far as costs are concerned (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 19). Before this provision the mis-joinder or non-joinder of a plaintiff in an action of contract was, and the latter mistake is still, fatal to the success of the proceedings unless amended. Of the importance of this question of the proper parties to sue, the present case is a good illustration; though it so happened that the view taken by the Court below was incorrect with regard to the application of the law to the case before them. The legal principle itself is simple and free from doubt. It is, that the plaintiff or plaintiffs must be the person or persons from whom the consideration for the contract moved. Thus in a case where the declaration stated that the plaintiff and one W. R. were partners, and that the firm being indebted to the plaintiff, the defendant, in consideration that the firm would assign to him the partnership, business, stock, &c., promised the plaintiff to pay him the partnership debt due to him, it was objected in arrest of judgment that the action should have been brought by the firm generally; but the Court held the action to have been rightly brought, for the separate interest of the plaintiff in the partnership fund was the consideration for the promise (Jones v. Robinson, 1 Exch. 454). This test is the proper one to decide whether a contract entered into with an individual partner may be put in suit by that individual alone,—for that it may at all events be sued upon by the firm generally, there is no question (see Alexander v. Barker, 2 Tyr. 140). An illustration of this distinction will be found in the following case. A guarantee was addressed to one of the members of a partnership in these terms:—"Sir, I understand from Mr. G. that you had the goodness to consent to advance £550 to discharge immediately a like sum for which he became security for his cousin upon my assurance (which I hereby give) that provision shall be made for repaying you this sum under the arrangements now going on for the settlement of Mr. G.'s concerns." Upon the faith of this guarantee the money was advanced by the partnership; and from some correspondence which subsequently took place between the firm and the defendant it appeared that the security was intended for the benefit of the firm generally. Upon this evidence the partner to whom the guarantee was given, having sued alone, was non-suited, and a subsequent action by the firm was successful. This was the case of Garrett v. Handley (3 B. &

C. 462; 4 B. & C. 664); and it was chiefly on the authority of this decision that the judgment of the colonial Court, now reversed in the Privy Council, was given. For the declaration in the action showed an agreement between an individual member of a firm (the plaintiff) and the defendant, to the effect that the latter should pay the former a certain sum in consideration of his not enforcing certain firm claims against a third party indebted to the defendant; and the plaintiff was non-suited, on the ground that the consideration moved from the firm generally, who ought accordingly to have been joined as co-plaintiffs. But the Privy Council distinguished the case of Garrett v. Handley, above referred to, by observing that there the consideration was necessarily joint, and could not be separated into parts—the advance of money being to be made not by the plaintiff, but by the firm of which he was a member. But in the present case the forbearance to sue (which was the consideration for the contract) was an act which depended upon the will of the plaintiff himself—he being (under the circumstances of the case) in a position to commence proceedings against the third party indebted to the defendant. And this forbearing constituted a consideration moving from the plaintiff, which entitled him to maintain an action on the agreement; though having been entered into for the benefit of the partners generally, it might also have been sued upon by the whole firm.

RULE AS TO MEASURE OF DAMAGES—LOSS OF BAILMENT.

Henderson v. The North-Eastern Railway Company, Exch., 9 W. R. 519.

This is an application of the rule as to damages laid down in the well-known case of Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341) to the loss of parcels by carriers or warehousemen. That case, it will be recollected, was an action against a carrier for damage occasioned by the non-delivery of part of a mill, owing to which the plaintiffs incurred a loss of profits—not being able, in the meantime, to work their mill. Here it was held that such loss could not be added to the damages recoverable; and the general principle was laid down that on a breach of contract such damages only could be recovered as could reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation of both parties when the contract was made, as the probable result of its breach; or which could fairly and reasonably be considered to have arisen from such breach in the usual course of things.

In the present case a parcel having been lost by the defendants, with whom it had been warehoused, the owner claimed as damages not only the value of the parcel, but also in respect of a loss of salary he had chanced to sustain by reason of the parcel being mislaid. This last claim, however, the Court held not to be maintainable; remarking that if the liability of warehousemen or carriers for the loss of parcels were to vary with the consequences of the loss, it would be impossible to define their liability. Some question was made in the argument of this case as to whether the company were sued as warehousemen or carriers; but it is apprehended that their liability would be the same, under the circumstances, as either class of bailees.

Correspondence.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS ACT, 1860.

In answer to your correspondent "Query," I am decidedly of opinion that by his appointment to the office of secretary to the building society he names, he would "hold an office," within the meaning of section 10 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. As he is not disposed to subject himself to any risk in the matter, I would advise him not to accept the offer. J. F. S.

THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

At a meeting of the Council of the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce held on the 13th inst., the proposed Law Lords' amendments in the Bankruptcy Bill were discussed, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"That the petition to the House of Lords with reference to the Bankruptcy Bill now read, be adopted and forwarded to Earl de Grey for presentation, and that the secretary address a letter to Lord Chelmsford in support of the statement contained in the petition, respectfully asking his lordship to give the views of this Chamber his careful consideration."

The following petition and letter have since been forwarded to Lord de Grey and Lord Chelmsford in accordance with the above resolution.

"To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled.

"The humble petition of the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce.

"Sheweth,—That in the opinion of your petitioners one of the greatest evils of the existing Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law is the want of adequate localisation of the jurisdiction, and that without proper provisions for accomplishing this object no amendment of the law will give satisfaction, or provide the means of obtaining a satisfactory investigation of the affairs of insolvent debtors owing large amounts, and residing in places at a distance from the seven towns now possessing district courts.

"That the creditors of debtors failing in large amounts are almost universally found to reside or carry on business in the immediate localities of such debtors, whilst in many cases of debtors failing in small amounts, the principal creditors consist of wholesale houses in London, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, according to the particular retail trade carried on by the debtor.

"That in the opinion of your memorialists the judicial labour in bankruptcy business is very trifling, and the existing county court judges in towns and districts not possessing bankruptcy courts, are well qualified and have ample time to dispose of the same much more satisfactorily to the commercial community generally (having regard to the convenience of creditors in attending their courts), than the existing bankruptcy commissioners.

"That your petitioners therefore consider that it is most desirable to retain the 7th and 8th clauses of the Bankruptcy Bill now before your honourable house, with such amendments, if your lordships consider them advisable, as will render it necessary for the sanction of Parliament to be obtained for the transfer of jurisdiction to county courts, under the 7th clause, and for the constitution of additional county courts, under the 8th clause.

"That in the opinion of your petitioners it is of great importance that bankruptcy commissioners and county court judges exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction, should possess the fullest power to remove proceedings to any other bankruptcy or county court, in which they consider the strictest investigation of the debtor's affairs may be most conveniently and economically obtained.

"That your petitioners therefore consider it most desirable to retain the 99th clause of the said Bill, substituting the bankruptcy commissioner or county court judge in whose court the proceedings are initiated, to the chief judge, to whom an application could not be made without considerable expense.

"That in the opinion of your petitioners the power given to a majority in number and value of the creditors to remove proceedings into county courts, provided by the 118th clause of the said Bill, is absolutely necessary in order to remove the great injustice under which the commercial community generally, except in the seven towns possessing Bankruptcy Courts, now labour, in consequence of their distance from the existing courts.

"That the operation of the last-mentioned clause could not possibly, in the opinion of your petitioners, produce any injury, as creditors would cease to remove bankruptcies if they found the county courts unfitted to deal with them, whilst on the other hand, the statistics of the cases removed would furnish the safest guide for Parliament or her Majesty in council in the adoption or rejection of the provisions contained in the 7th and 8th clauses of the said Bill.

"That your petitioners, in common with the mercantile community generally, in other large manufacturing towns throughout England, are therefore most anxious that the said clauses should be retained, or that the passing of the said Bill may be postponed, and that a committee of your lordships' House may examine witnesses upon the subject.

"That your petitioners are also of opinion that in order to economise expense, it is desirable that the granting of the bankrupt's certificate of discharge in town cases should be vested in the commissioners, whether the application be opposed or not, subject to appeal to the chief judge; and your petitioners, therefore, respectfully submit that clause 164 of the said Bill should be amended accordingly.

"Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that the 99th and 164th clauses of the said Bill may be amended in such manner as your lordships may consider advisable, and that the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 118th clauses of the said Bill may be retained, or that the said Bill may not be allowed to pass your lordships'

House until a committee of your lordships' House has examined witnesses upon the subject "And your petitioners will ever pray," &c.

"WILLIAM WILLIAMS, President."

"Chamber of Commerce,

"Huddersfield, 14th May, 1861.

"My Lord,—I trust your lordship will pardon addressing to you, at the request of the Council of the Chamber, a few observations upon certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Bill, to which the Chamber has for some years given great attention, and which your lordship purposes to strike out or modify. I do so with very great deference, and with every wish to acknowledge most warmly, on behalf of the Chamber, the sacrifices which your lordship must have made, in order to give the Bill that careful consideration which it has received at your lordship's hands. Indeed, so strong is my conviction of the weight due to your lordship's opinion, that I should have abstained altogether from troubling you, if I had not been persuaded that your lordship's views have been affected by representations from interested localities in which opinions are held, which are opposed to the reasonable requirements of the commercial community generally.

"I need not remind your lordship that the most important objects of the Bill now before Parliament are to separate the judicial and administrative functions of our bankruptcy tribunals, to give to the court the former, and to the creditors or their trustees the latter, subject to the proper control of the court, as distinguished from the mischievous intermeddling of its officials, to secure more thorough investigation and due punishment for offences, to reduce expenses, to abolish unnecessary officialism, and to provide such other amendments as will render the court a desirable tribunal by creditors, and honest but unfortunate debtors, instead of being, as now, held in abhorrence by the former, and only serviceable to the dishonest portion of the latter. Mercantile men, generally, are satisfied that the measure before Parliament will do much towards the removal of existing evils, but the provisions which the commercial community throughout the country (excepting in London and the seven towns possessing bankruptcy courts), regard most hopefully, are those abolishing the compulsory employment of official assignees, and the 7th, 8th, 9th, 99th, 105th, and 118th clauses, the most important of which your lordship proposes to strike out altogether. With regard to these clauses, so strong is the opinion generally entertained that without the localisation of the jurisdiction provided by them, all other reforms will be perfectly futile in providing the means for an economical and satisfactory investigation of bankrupts' affairs, and so strong is the feeling of the injustice of denying these advantages for the sake of preserving intact the local interests of the large towns having bankruptcy courts, that I feel sure the adoption of your lordship's amendments will be the signal for the presentation of petitions against the passing of the Bill from every large manufacturing community throughout the country. The provisions embodied in the clauses in question have, for many years past, been the subject of discussions between the representatives of commercial interests in small towns, and in the seven bankruptcy district towns, and it is only justice to the latter to state, that very little explanation has been sufficient, in most cases, to satisfy them of the extreme selfishness and injustice of opposing the adoption of provisions similar to those contained in the Bill. In fact, a virtual compromise has, in the course of the agitation, been come to, which is embodied in the Bill introduced by her Majesty's Government, and I have no doubt that if your lordship will consult commercial men in the large towns possessing district courts, your lordship will be satisfied that, with very rare exceptions, they are convinced of the reasonableness of making the concessions provided by the Bill, for the convenience of less favoured localities.

"The petition to the House of Lords (of which I beg to hand your lordship a copy) states, in general terms, the views held by this and other commercial bodies, and I will therefore confine my farther remarks to a few detailed observations on the clauses I have mentioned, and to an attempt to answer the objections made to them, asking your lordship's consideration of a statement of the disadvantages resulting from the want of localization, stated in a parliamentary paper, dated 25th March, 1852, entitled "District Courts of Bankruptcy Abolition Bill, 1852," "Paper of Observations explanatory of the object of the Bill."

"Clauses 7, 8, and 9, apparently contemplate an eventual transfer of the jurisdiction in the country to the county courts, and I submit that nothing can be more reasonable than to make provisions for such a transfer, if the county courts prove themselves fitted for the administration of bankruptcy law. Clause 118 provides for the experiment in an unexceptionable manner.

"As to clause 7, your lordship will observe that the provision can never operate in the districts having two bankruptcy commissioners, if the amount of business is so great as to require each vacancy to be filled up as it occurs, and if your lordships' House considers that when the contingency does arise, the provision should not operate without the sanction of Parliament, an amendment to that effect might be easily made.

"Clause 8 does virtually require the sanction of Parliament for the constitution of new county courts, as the salaries of any additional judges must be provided for, and the order in council establishing the courts (as the clause stands) is required to be laid before Parliament.

"With the suggested amendment I have mentioned I trust your lordship will be induced to withdraw your objections to these clauses, leaving it to future experience to determine the expediency of putting in force those provisions which your lordship's House may feel reluctant absolutely to adopt, at present.

"Upon clause 99 I have only to remark that, in the opinion of commercial men generally, the court in which proceedings are instituted (not the chief judge, to whom an application would, in most cases, be avoided on the ground of expense) should possess the fullest power of removing the proceedings to such other court as would most economically and effectually administer the estate and investigate the affairs of the debtor.

"With respect to clause 105, I am quite prepared to admit that debtors residing in any county court district within which there is a bankruptcy court should petition the latter, whatever the amount of his debts or assets may be, so as to confine all insolvency business to the same tribunal.

"Clause 118 is, in the opinion of commercial men, in all towns not having bankruptcy courts, quite indispensable; and I feel justified in saying that they would prefer that Parliament should reject the Bill altogether, rather than pass it without this provision.

"In cases of bankruptcies of debtors owing large amounts, and engaged in any of the staple trades of the country, the creditors are almost universally found in the immediate neighbourhood of the town in which the debtor resides, and when your lordship considers that many of these towns are centres of manufacturing districts, containing from 20,000 to 80,000 inhabitants—nearly all of them having county courts constantly open, with judges residing on the spot, and holding regular court days every ten days within very limited circuits—the district bankruptcy courts being from 10 to 100 miles distant, your lordship will not be surprised at the indignation which has been aroused by the attempts now being made to induce your lordship's House to reject this—to them—most important part of the measure.

"It is indisputable that it is the convenience of creditors which is to be considered in fixing the locality of the administration, and I cannot conceive any means by which the competency of the county courts to administer bankruptcy law, can be more safely tested. If creditors do not find the county courts qualified to deal with bankruptcy questions, they will cease to remove them—the evil, if there be any, will work its own cure; but Parliament cannot reasonably expect the commercial community to submit further to such an injustice as the present system inflicts upon them, when it is capable of so easy and judicious a remedy.

"Your lordship is aware that the entire abolition of the district bankruptcy courts, and a transfer of their jurisdiction to the county courts, have been frequently advocated by some of our most able law reformers, in both Houses of Parliament; and it is almost universally agreed, that if the county courts had been established before the Act constituting district bankruptcy courts, the latter would never have had any existence. This is a far bolder proposition than the one contained in the Government measure, and there are many objections to it which have no application to the provisions in the Bill to which I have referred, one of the most important being the amount of compensations which would be required for the bankruptcy commissioners. The objectors to such a transfer of the jurisdiction invariably rely on the report of the royal commission (Mr. Walpole's commission), dated 10th April, 1854, and I shall feel greatly obliged if your lordship will look at the evidence taken by this commission, and then consider the concluding part of their report dealing with this question. Your lordship will find that out of seventeen witnesses examined not one of them was from the country; that the circular letters of inquiry issued to one hundred and seventy commercial bodies and individuals did not raise the question as to the advantages or disadvantages of an absolute transfer of jurisdiction, or a permissive power to transfer cases to the county courts after adjudication, but only asked, in general terms, (p. 221), 'Do you suggest, and on what grounds, any and what amendments of the existing system in bankruptcy other than those already mentioned?' Your lordship will find also that only one of these circulars was sent to a place not possessing a bankruptcy court, the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, whose reply was as follows (p. 474):—"The Court of Bankruptcy, as at present constituted, is clumsy in its machinery and expensive in its working: the business would be better conducted, and at far less expense, if removed to the county courts, so as to insure to each district the management of its own affairs. The difficulty of getting trade assignees to act would be removed, the estates wound up more expeditiously, and with greater economy, and the conduct of the bankrupt being adjudicated by parties to whom he is known, the award would be more in accordance.' The evidence, with this single exception, was entirely one-sided; and, under such circumstances, your lordship will, I am sure, feel how little weight attaches to the decision of the commissioners upon this question, especially as even, upon such partial testimony, they were only able to report as follows, which has really very little bearing on the question now at issue (p. xlii.):—

"On our present information, therefore, we should be inclined to preserve, as a distinct jurisdiction, the district courts of bankruptcy; especially as we fear that the union of that jurisdiction with the jurisdiction of the county courts might be detrimental to both. At all events, we cannot recommend such an alteration as this, if it is to saddle the country or the suitor with very heavy compensations."

"The only other recorded objection to the absolute transfer of the jurisdiction to the county courts, of which I am aware is contained in a paper read by Mr. Edward Bond, an eminent practitioner in the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, whose name will no doubt be familiar to your lordship. Mr. Bond, in speaking of the court, says (p. 9):—

"It must be local, and it should be stationary. The county courts are already overworked; they sit at different places; there is no appeal from the exercise of their jurisdiction in insolvency; and their machinery is not adapted to administrative purposes. That of the courts of bankruptcy, with some alterations, may be well fitted for the objects in view. Those courts have at present scarcely anything to do. With the present staff one commissioner might sit every day at the same place, so as to be at all times accessible (which, however, is unfortunately far from being the case at present); and this is of the utmost importance in very many cases where prompt action is required. With such amendments as may be found requisite they are, therefore, the most fitting tribunals to undertake that which, according to the plan which has been faintly shadowed out, would become the sole primary jurisdiction in all matters of insolvency, and by giving it to them no expense would be incurred either in new appointments or retiring pensions."

"Upon the 1st point, it may be observed that the county court judges in the manufacturing districts have very limited circuits, and are almost daily sitting at one of three or four known places within a few miles of each other. The registrars are in daily attendance at every place where a court is held, and the convenience of suitors is much more likely to be thereby secured than by a non-resident bankruptcy commissioner, who only comes down into the country on certain court days and whose own court is to a certain extent ambulatory, attendance being given occasionally in two or three other towns besides the district town. As to the county courts being unable to do the work, it may be observed, that the actual judicial work in bankruptcy is very trifling. The number of hours during which the bankruptcy commissioners sat in the year of 1851 will be found in a Parliamentary paper (No. 52, 1852), from which it appears that an additional sitting of three hours per week by the county court judges in the country would have disposed of the same amount of work as that done by the whole of the district commissioners, assuming that the latter were employed during the time they were reported as sitting, which those who are accustomed to frequent the bankruptcy court, know would not be case.

"As to the machinery of the courts, it need only be said, that when the judicial and administrative functions of the court are separated, the latter will be given to the creditors and their trustees, and this objection falls to the ground. All that is required is a judge, a registrar to record his judgments, and a bailiff to execute the orders of the court.

"I wish, my lord, in conclusion, to reiterate that in the opinion of this and every other commercial body which has given the subject due consideration, it is almost impossible to over-estimate the advantage to be gained by increased localization of the jurisdiction. If the question at issue were really that of the unconditional transfer of the jurisdiction to the county courts, I should, independently of the question of compensation, leave the case of those who advocate the transfer of the jurisdiction in your lordship's hands, with great confidence, after hearing the evidence which could be adduced. I trust therefore that I may, multo fortiori, rely upon your lordship's favourable consideration of the remarks I have ventured to make, in support of the experimental and moderate alterations, which the clauses I have mentioned are intended to effect.

"If I have expressed my views somewhat boldly, I trust your lordship will attribute it to the strength of my convictions and the somewhat hasty manner in which I am compelled to write, and not to any want of respect for your lordship as a statesman and a lawyer, as I can assure your lordship the Council of this Chamber warmly appreciate the endeavours made by your lordship to render the Bill as perfect as possible.

"I have the honour to be, my lord,
 "Your lordship's most obedient, and "very humble servant,
 "J. RAYNER, Secretary."

HINTS TO ARTICLED CLERKS.

No. V.

We have, more than once, endeavoured to impress upon the minds of our readers the fact, that a mere knowledge of law and practice, however useful it may be to the attorney, is not the only acquirement to which their energies should be directed. There is, perhaps, no profession the members of which ought more to aim at being men of the world, at being able to bear their share in the general business of life. An uncouth, half-educated man, however well versed he may be in the technicalities of law, can have little hope of acquiring the same social position as one who has the manners and education of a gentleman, and a good standing in society is of very great importance in a professional point of view. The attorney is often intrusted with matters of so much delicacy, is so frequently brought into contact with men of high social status, and holds such an intimate connection with his clients, that he can hardly do his duty either towards them or himself, unless he has the feelings and the manners which go to form the notion of the English gentleman. Mr. Solomon Pell may indeed be able to conduct his clients satisfactorily through the mazes of the Insolvent Court; Mr. Quirk may be admirable at an alibi; and Mr. Snap's power of manufacturing a bill of costs may be something wonderful; but although such persons may do the dirty work of the profession, they can never arrive at its high places. Men of quite a different stamp are called in when a marriage settlement is to be negotiated, when family differences are to be arranged, when heavy conveyancing business is to be transacted, or when an important litigation is to be conducted in the Superior Courts.

We counsel the student, then, during his clerkship to cultivate the feelings of the gentleman; to learn to distinguish between the honourable and the dishonourable—between skill and its base counterfeit, cunning. Much may be effected towards the attainment of this object by reading the works of the great masters of English literature, whose influence upon the heart is no less than their influence upon the intellect. The student of Milton and of Shakespeare can hardly possess a creeping, pettifogging spirit; the readers of Hallam and Froude can hardly be otherwise than candid and tolerant; while the pages of Thackeray and Kingsley are well calculated to impress upon their readers an honest scorn of what is base and vile, and a hearty love for wisdom and virtue. Nor will the student find it to be less desirable to cultivate the acquaintance and friendship of men to whom he can look up rather than of those upon whom he must look down. A taste for low company is a besetting sin of some young men, and a ridiculous pride is at the root of it. Among their equals they can have no feeling of superiority, while among their superiors they have a humbling feeling of inferiority. It is delightful to change this, without any trouble on their part, for a position in which their word is law, and where there is no one to dispute their pre-eminence. We pray our readers to avoid such a fatal blunder on their entrance into life.

The articled clerk will find that after devoting all needful attention to the duties of the office and to his professional reading, he still has some time left at his own disposal for recreation and pursuits not directly bearing upon his profession. Upon the proper employment of these leisure hours will depend much of his future success and happiness. We have already touched upon the great benefit which he may derive from a generous, manly course of English reading; and if he husband his time carefully he may, during the period of his clerkship, make himself master of many of our great classic authors, thus laying in a fund of amusement and instruction for his riper years. What he reads attentively between sixteen and twenty-five he is not likely to forget, whereas much of the reading of maturer life easily passes away from the mind. As to the specific books which he should read we do not intend to offer any advice, because, under certain limitations, his own taste and inclination will furnish the best guide. Those limitations are, that he should not addict himself chiefly to the current literature of the day, but should make himself well acquainted with some of our older writers, that he should not attempt to keep pace with the fugitive literature of reviews, magazines, and literary newspapers; that he should make himself well acquainted with English history, and that he should manage to read any book which, for the time being, may be making a great stir in the world of literature. We are no enemies, either, to novel reading, or to what is sometimes contemptuously called general reading. The man who reads nothing but novels may well insist upon being written down "ass" for his pains; but it is a positive misfortune not to have read such novels as "Jane Eyre," "Adam Bede," and "Bar-chester Towers." The professional man who necessarily has a good deal of hard reading upon one particular science, such as law, will probably find general reading not only the most amusing and interesting, but the most profitable. We can only devote to it his spare time, and it would be too much to expect from most men, that after a day laboriously spent in the office or in court, they should sit down to fag at reading up some particular subject. A great French lawyer said indeed, un changement des études est toujours un délassement pour moi; but with the great bulk of mankind this is certainly not the case.

It is very desirable that the student should acquire during his student life some knowledge of the art of public speaking. A perusal of some of the best specimens of parliamentary and forensic eloquence will very much assist him in this object, as also will his embracing any opportunities which he may have to hear our best speakers. And as no man can be a really effective speaker unless he knows the powers of our noble language as developed by its greatest masters, the course of general reading which we have mentioned will be found of the greatest advantage as showing what can be done by words. Hearing and reading, however, alone will never enable a man, unless he has extraordinary gifts, to make even a respectable appearance as a public speaker. He must practise what he has learned from books and from other speakers, and that too not in solitude, but before an audience. Hence we recommend our readers by all means to ally themselves with some debating club or discussion class, where they may make their first essays in the art of oratory. They will probably fail at first, not one out of a hundred of them will probably become a finished speaker; but every one of them may if he has perseverance acquire the art, possessed by so few people, of speaking sensibly and collectedly before a large audience. Some men may perhaps be born orators, but by far the larger proportion, however well educated they may be, however easily and clearly their thoughts may flow upon paper, are utterly confused when called upon to address, for the first time, more than a dozen people. At the same time, although nature does so little for us in this respect, practice will do almost everything, and will convert the most nervous stammerer that ever bored and pained an audience into a very respectable speaker, well able to convince and persuade those whom he addresses.

But however important it may be to the attorney to be a sound lawyer, to have an intimate acquaintance with English literature, and to be able to express himself clearly and forcibly in public, all these acquirements may be thrown away, or very materially diminished in value for practical purposes, if he has not a fair share of bodily health and strength. True it is that we often see men of ability and learning performing wonders in spite of ill health and weakness. But, other things being equal, the strongest body will carry the day in law as well as in other pursuits. The healthy man brings to his work a fund of courage, of animal spirits, and of dash, which are wholly wanting to the nervous valetudinarian. However full of learning the latter may be, he will often be defeated by the energetic onset, and cool self-reliance of the former, even where there may be no comparison between the ability of the two as mere lawyers. With by far the greater part of mankind, the mind sympathizes with the body, and if the latter be ailing the former will not be in perfect health. If the functions of the stomach are not properly performed, the brain will be clouded: if the lungs are delicate, their owner will not improbably find himself vacillating and nervous: if the heart is deranged, the whole man is easily excited and irritable: while a peccant liver may unfit its unfortunate possessor for all the active duties of life. And although we have admitted that men of feeble body may sometimes perform gigantic intellectual feats, the sun of such men too often goes down at noon day. The late Sir Wm. Follett and John William Smith will long be remembered as among the greatest advocates and lawyers of their time; but they died while yet young men, and before reaching that professional rank which such men as Lyndhurst, Campbell, Brougham, and Pollock, have done hardly less by virtue of their bodily than of their mental strength. Now, we confess that good health, absolute and complete, is not at the command of every one. But a man who is naturally of a delicate and weakly constitution may do much to better his condition by temperance in all things, by exercise in the open air, by proper attention to diet, and by cultivating a cheerful and happy temper. On the other hand, if a young man blessed by nature with a fine constitution does his best to ruin it by excesses, by sluggishness, and by moping alone, he may easily accomplish this object even before he comes of age. We would especially insist upon the importance of exercise to the articulated clerk. His profession is a sedentary one, and sedentary habits grow upon a man very imperceptibly and very rapidly. He should therefore guard against them most carefully, and contrive to use his limbs as much as possible. Boating, cricketing or pedestrian exercise are at the command of almost every young man, and those who can now and then command a day's shooting or a day after the hounds will do well to avail themselves of it. Such amusements as these are not only healthful in themselves, but they also destroy or at any rate very much diminish the taste for pleasure, indulgence in which is fatal both to health of body and peace of mind.

And now we bring to a close these Hints to Articled Clerks. Many subjects might have been handled at greater length, and others might have been introduced which we have advisedly omitted. We trust, however, that we have marked out such a plan of study for our younger readers, and have given them such counsels upon matters collateral to their professional reading, as they will find useful in preparing for the arduous and honourable duties which they are hereafter to fulfil. We cannot conclude, however, without reminding the student that he is now forming habits and a character which will most probably adhere to him during life. If, at the close of his clerkship his friends knew him to be able, industrious, and honourable, the great probability—we had almost said, the certainty—is, that he will be known as such during his whole career; whereas, if, on the other hand, he is at that critical period idle, dissipated, and ignorant, the chances are that he will remain so to his latest day. A man reaps what he sows: he can reap nothing else. It must surely, then, be of the last importance that in the great and glorious seed-time of youth, which comes but once, but the results of which remain for ever, good seed should be cast into the ground. That our readers may resolve and act upon the resolution that this shall be the case with them is the earnest hope with the expression of which we bid them farewell.

TRINITY TERM EXAMINATION.

The Incorporated Law Society have caused the following circular to be addressed to candidates for admission as attorneys in Trinity Term:—

17th May, 1861.

Sir,—I am directed, by the examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys, to inform you that you are required to attend on Wednesday the 5th and Thursday the 6th June next, at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane, in order to be examined. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock each day.

I have to remind you that your articles of clerkship and assignment, if any, with answers to the questions as to due service, according to the regulations approved by the judges, must be left with me on or before Tuesday the 28th May. (Candidates under the 4th section of the Attorneys Act, 1860, may, on application, obtain copies of the further questions relating to the ten years' service antecedent to the articles of clerkship.)

Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the term, or in the vacation following such term, the candidate may be examined conditionally; but the articles must be left within the first seven days of term, and answers up to that time. If part of the term has been served with a barrister, special pleader, or London agent, answers to the questions must be obtained from them, as to the time served with each respectively.

On the first day of examination, papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in writing, classed under the several heads of—1. Preliminary. 2. Common law and statute law, and practice of the courts. 3. Conveyancing.

On the second day, further papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in—4. Equity, and practice of the courts. 5. Bankruptcy, and practice of the courts. 6. Criminal law, and proceedings before justices of the peace.

Each candidate is required to answer all the preliminary questions (No. 1); and also to answer in three of the other heads of inquiry, viz.:—Common law, Conveyancing, and Equity. The examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in bankruptcy and in criminal law and proceedings before justices of the peace, in order that candidates who have given their attention to these subjects, may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

In case your testimonials were deposited in a former term, they should be re-entered, the fee paid, and the answers completed, to the time appointed.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,
ROBERT MAUGHAM, Secretary.

ATMOSPHERIC CLOCKS, OR MERCURIAL

TIMEKEEPERS.—These ingenious and simple timekeepers are the most remarkable scientific novelties of the day. They indicate time by the gradual descent of a column of mercury, in a glass tube, which, when descended, or nearly so, the clock merely requires to be reversed. In appearance they resemble the thermometer. Prices 4s. 6d., 5s., 10s. 6d., 12s. 6d., 15s., and upwards. The Guinea Clock with Silver Dial makes an elegant present. They are adapted for all climates, never get out of repair, nor require cleaning. For India and the colonies they are very suitable. Orders, accompanied with a remittance or post-office order, payable to C. LANGSTON, Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C., will meet with prompt attention. Export orders shipped direct to any part of the world, and commissions for other goods at the same time executed on the best terms. Wholesale, Retail, and Export Depot of the Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C. Orders received for CLEGG'S PATENT VICTORIA GARDEN PUMPS, and for CLEGG'S PATENT CARRIAGE TELEGRAPH, or DRIVER'S GUIDE, which will entirely supersede the ordinary clock-string.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £23,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds; a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds, to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

Thomas Raymond Barker, Esq., add., £25, making up	£100 0 0	The Rev. A. Climold,	£50 0 0
		Messrs. Gale & Co.	5 5 0
		Messrs. Cox & Co.	100 0 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers. April, 1861. JOHN ROBERTSON, Hon. Sec.

CURRENT TOPICS.

An Act which has just received the Royal assent is intended to multiply largely the number of savings banks, by enabling persons desiring to deposit small sums of money upon Government security, to do so at the post offices throughout the country. The measure is calculated to encourage habits of economy among the poorer classes, and will probably prove advantageous to the public exchequer, by procuring for it considerable sums of money at a low rate of interest. In some recent articles upon the financial arrangements of our courts, we took occasion to suggest how very useful to chancery suitors, and still more so to the public, would be a similar measure, in reference to monies paid into court pending litigation, or awaiting distribution. At present, all money in the hands of the court either remains wholly unremunerative to those entitled to it, or it must be invested, although it may be wanting before a dividend is payable, or before the investment can possibly pay for its expense, which, we believe, is not less than a half per cent. There is, moreover, always the risk that when the money is required, the stock may be of less value than the sum invested. Indeed, within a year or two, there was a curious illustration of the embarrassment which may arise from this circumstance. A sum had been paid in under the order of the Court, and was invested; but when the title to the fund was clear, and it came to be paid out, the stock had so much decreased in marketable value, that it was insufficient to realize the original amount of cash; and a question arose, who was to suffer the loss resulting from the investment? By a practice very recently introduced at the Registrar's Office, this question is now prevented from arising, by the insertion in the order of the name of the party at whose request, and therefore at whose risk, the investment is made. But the hardship remains, that where the money may probably be wanting in the course of a few months, there is not only the risk of loss by the lowering of the price of stock, but also the expense of buying and selling, as well as of the turn in the market in each transaction. Why should not the Government, on the one hand, have the advantage of the use, at a small interest, of the large sums of money which, under these circumstances, always are uninvested in the hands of the Court of Chancery? and, on the other, why should not suitors have the benefit of such interest? They would not, as a rule, object to a low rate, say two per cent.; and at this price the Chancellor of the Exchequer might reckon upon the use of not less than four or five millions of money, which would be an important item of saving to the country. We recommend the suggestion to Mr. Gladstone, and have no doubt that some of our readers can adduce other good reasons for its adoption.

Trinity Term commenced on Wednesday last. The arrears of business at both sides of Westminster Hall (excepting the Divorce Court) are light. In the Queen's Bench there are four rules in the new trial paper for judgment, and fifty for argument. In the special paper there are two for judgment, and forty-three for argument, besides which there are seven enlarged rules. In the Common Pleas there are eight enlarged rules, nineteen in the new trial paper, five matters standing for the decision of the Court, and fifteen demurrers entered. In the Exchequer there are eight errors and appeals, five rules in the peremptory paper and ten in the special paper for argument, while of new trials there are five for judgment, and eighteen for argument. In the Divorce Court there are 155 causes, of which twelve are suits for judicial separation, one is a suit for nullity, and one for restitution of conjugal rights, and the remainder are suits for dissolution of marriage. Five of these cases are part heard, and eight of them are to be tried by special juries, and thirty-five by common juries. Notwithstanding all that has been said about a great falling off in Chancery business, the number of causes down for hearing on the first day of term, in all the branches of the Court, was not less than 349, being within five of the number in the list on the first day of Trinity Term last year. The great bulk of the business, however, is very recent, and the state of the Chancery Cause List, Term after Term, affords abundant proof of the great increase in the efficiency of the Court and the speed of its proceedings.

THE FOREIGN LAW ASCERTAINMENT BILL.

The laws of foreign countries have been hitherto proved in our courts as facts, and not regarded as legal data, of which our judges should be presumed to have judicial notice. But it is by no means clear whether the enactments of foreign law should be proved as facts to the Court, or as facts to the jury. Perhaps, if Lord Brougham's statement in Bain v. Whitehaven and Furness Railway Co., (3 H. L. Cas. p. 19), be correct, the ascertainment of foreign law would not often be of great importance. His lordship there said, that it is only "as to the stipulations of a contract made abroad our courts are bound by foreign law, which must be to them a matter of fact." His lordship then proceeds to say that the law of evidence is governed by the lex fori, and adds, "whether a witness is competent or not; whether a certain matter requires to be proved by writing or not; whether a certain evidence proves a certain fact or not;—that is to be determined by the law of the country where the question arises, and where the remedy is sought to be enforced." This extension of the lex fori would considerably abridge the province usually assigned to foreign law. The ascertainment of such law could not, according to his lordship's statement, be very important unless the question at issue here turned upon some positive foreign statute, the provisions of which should have been strictly observed in the contract or transaction under dispute. But, whether foreign law be allowed to have an extensive or narrow operation in our courts, this very doubtfulness is a sufficient ground for the introduction of the Bill now before Parliament, for the better ascertainment of foreign law.

It has not been doubted that the Court is the proper authority to decide as to what is sufficient evidence of the laws of a foreign country. The weight of authority inclines also to the opinion that the determination of all questions relating to foreign law belongs to the Court and not to the jury; and that these have merely to apply the result of such laws to the matters in dispute before them. It would certainly be very inconvenient if a jury were the ultimate authority upon any question of law; and that their verdict, founded upon their own construction of a foreign law, should be as conclusive as if it were upon a pure matter of fact. Nevertheless, some authority, and that too of a recent date, is not wanting to show that the determination of questions of foreign law belongs to the province of the jury, and not to that of the Court. Thus in Trasher v. Everhart, (3 Gill & J. Amer. rep., 234), the Court said, "It is in general true that foreign laws are facts which are to be found by the jury." Even Lord Mansfield, in Mostyn v. Fabrigas (Cowp. 174), is reported to have said, "The way of knowing foreign laws is by admitting them to be proved as facts; and the Court must assist the jury in ascertaining what the law is." He thus seems to have held that the function of determining the existence and nature of foreign laws primarily rested with the jury. Storey, however, and the main current of authority, are to the contrary; so that it may be safely laid down that the determination of questions of foreign law is a function of the Court, and not of the jury; although the Court will allow those laws to be proved to them as facts by persons who have had experience and practice, and not merely a theoretical instruction in them.

Proof of the positive statutes of foreign countries is, in the present state of the law, comparatively easy. It is usually made by producing authenticated copies of such written laws, according to the general principle of evidence, which requires that the best available proof should be produced. Foreign statutes, however, cannot always be very readily interpreted by judges who are unacquainted with the general system of the jurisprudence of such foreign countries. When the law in dispute is unwritten, and may therefore be proved by parol evidence, the difficulties are multiplied. In Bremer v. Freeman, (5 W. R. 618), eight French advocates differed from each other in their account of the French law applicable to the case. The public seal of a foreign sovereign affixed to a written edict, law, or judgment will be noticed judicially (6 Maul. & Selw. 34): but the seal of a foreign court has not this privilege (3 East. 221). If, however, the Court have an Admiralty jurisdiction, then, such being a Court of the Law of Nations, the judicature of other countries will take notice judicially of such seal without positive proof of its authenticity.

The Bill for the Better Ascertainment of the Law of Foreign Countries, now before Parliament, is intended to remove such uncertainty, and consequent expense, as was occasioned by the evidence in Bremer v. Freeman. After reciting the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, which related to the ascertainment of the law administered in one part of her Majesty's dominions by the courts of another part thereof, it provides that in any action before any Court in her Majesty's dominions, such Court may "direct a case to be prepared setting forth the facts as these may be ascertained by verdict of a jury or other competent mode, or as may be agreed upon by the parties, or settled by such person or persons as may have been appointed by the Court for that purpose, in the event of the parties not agreeing." Upon such case the Court or a judge thereof is to settle the questions of law, and remit the same with the case to a Superior Court in a foreign State with which her Majesty may have entered into a convention to that effect, and request such Court to pronounce their opinion on the questions thus submitted to them. A copy of such opinion duly certified is to be deemed a correct record of such opinion when pronounced (Section 1). The second section directs that the Court in which the action depends shall upon motion (if made) apply such opinion and the facts of the case before it "in the same manner as if such opinion had been pronounced by itself upon a case reserved for its opinion, or upon special verdict of a jury." If such opinion shall have been obtained before trial, the Court may, in its discretion, order that such opinion be submitted to the jury as conclusive evidence of the foreign law therein stated. This section differs somewhat from the corresponding one in the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, inasmuch as by the latter Act the opinion may be submitted to the jury either as presumptive or conclusive evidence of the law which it describes. The 3rd section provides that if a case be sent by a Court in a foreign country to any of her Majesty's courts for an opinion upon such case, in pursuance of a convention between the Governments of both countries to that effect, it shall be competent to any of the parties to the action to present a petition to that Court of her Majesty whose opinion is sought to be obtained, praying such Court to hear the parties or their counsel on such case. The Court may then appoint an early day for such hearing. The Court must pronounce an opinion upon the case; and, in order to their pronouncing such opinion, it may take further procedure thereupon as it may think proper. A certified copy of the opinion, when pronounced, is to be given to such of the parties as may require it. The interpretation clause explains, amongst other definitions, that the word "action" is intended by the Act to include "every judicial proceeding instituted in any court, civil, military, or ecclesiastical." The second section of the Bill does not leave the Court from which the special case is sent any discretion as to accepting such opinion. The Court must accept it, and can only exercise a discretion in applying it to the case. When the Court of Chancery had the power of sending special cases to the courts of law, it might reject the opinions given thereon if it choose—a discretion, however, which it rarely exercised. The corresponding Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, already referred to, renders the opinions, to which it relates, binding upon the Court that remitted the case, but not upon the Privy Council or the House of Lords. The present Bill does not except these tribunals; and, as it is almost a verbatim copy of the former Act, there is strong reason to presume that both the Privy Council and the House of Lords are intended to be bound by the opinion of the foreign court when obtained. There was no reason why the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, should render the opinion of any Court on a special case binding upon the tribunals of last resort, inasmuch as these Courts should hear appeals brought even directly from the Court which pronounced an opinion under that Act. But, as our appellate tribunals have no jurisdiction over foreign courts, there is an a priori reason why those tribunals should be equally as bound by the opinions of foreign courts as is the court which remitted the case. It would be idle to render the opinion of a foreign court binding only upon the judicature which sent the case; since, if the latter court exceeded its jurisdiction, and ignored the opinion, such an error on the part of the subordinate tribunal might be affirmed by the court of ultimate appeal. The Bill, if it becomes law, is likely to be often acted upon by the Privy Council. This tribunal, being the court of ultimate appeal for the Admiralty, Ecclesiastical, Indian, and Colonial Courts, has to deal chiefly with those questions which are connected with international law, or with the Roman civil code, which prevails so extensively in the jurisprudence of a great part of the continent of Europe, and, consequently, in the codes of such of our colonies as derive their laws from those continental states to which they originally belonged. The Bill directs that the opinion obtained in pursuance of it from a foreign court is to be treated as a matter of law, to be submitted to the consideration of the Court only; or, if left to the jury, that it should be deemed by them as conclusive evidence of the foreign law. The opinion is thus virtually reduced to a pure matter of law. At all events, all doubt as to the province of the court, or of the jury, as regards the proving of foreign laws, is removed. The Bill bids fair upon many grounds to effect a saving of expense to litigants. It is also eminently calculated to prevent the recurrence of such uncertainty as occurred in Bremer v. Freeman. The answer of the foreign court may possibly be wrong, but it will not be very uncertain or ambiguous. It will not, however, leave us the unpleasant option of selecting one out of many contradictory opinions.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. II.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

Of the Remedies against Piracy of a Trade Mark

I have attempted to show* that the view now taken by Courts of Equity on questions affecting the use of trade marks, justifies the assertion that there is a qualified property in a name, mark, or devise, used to distinguish a particular manufacture; the qualification being the use of the mark in combination with the manufacture; and that on this ground alone, of there being such a quasi-property, can some of the later decisions be upheld. At law on the other hand the injury done to a trader in respect of his trade mark, cannot be considered as anything more than a personal injury, to be compensated by damages. The next question, therefore, which we shall have to consider is, what are the means which have been employed, or attempted to be employed, up to the present time to protect the trader in the use of his mark, whether considered as property, or as a mere personal right. These are of three classes.

1. By criminal indictment.
2. By action for damages.
3. By injunction.

I. There are two heads of crime under which it might be expected that the fraudulent imitation of a trade mark would be indictable—as a forgery—or as the obtaining money under false pretences. The first of these methods was adopted in the case of Reg. v. J. Smith, 1 Dearsley & Bell 566. The imitation in this case consisted of a printed label, which was an exact imitation of the labels attached by the prosecutor George Borwick to packets of his powder called “Borwick’s Baking Powder,” with this exception that the signature “George Borwick” was omitted in the counterfeit. It was contended on the part of the prosecution that the term forgery might be defined as the alteration or making of a false document with intent to defraud; and cases were cited in which the fraudulent imitation of a printed document such as a diploma of the College of Surgeons, the good-conduct certificate of the master of a ship, and of a clergyman as to the character of a schoolmaster, had been held to be forgeries. It was, however, unanimously held by the bench that the conviction was not sustainable; that the issuing of the wrapper or label without the powder which it enclosed would be no offence; and that in the printing of the wrappers there was no forgery committed by the printer. Bramwell, B., there said, “Forgery supposes the possibility of a genuine document, and that the false document is not so good as the genuine document, and that the one is not so efficacious for all purposes as the other;” that, in the case before him, “one of the documents is as good as the other—the one asserts what the other does—the one is as true as the other, but one gets improperly used.” I have stated this case at some length, because it is the only instance that I am aware of in which a criminal prosecution has been instituted against the fraudulent imitator of a trade mark.

I can find no case in which an indictment for obtaining money under false pretences has been preferred in a case of this sort; still, there seems to be no doubt that in principle it would be applicable. Indeed, in the case just cited, Willes, J., says, “In cases like the present the remedy is well known; the prosecutor may, if he pleases, file a bill in equity to restrain the defendant from using the wrapper, or he may bring an action at law for damages, or he may indict him for obtaining money under false pretences.” This opinion of Mr. Justice Willes was assented to with more or less positiveness by the other judges; and it seems somewhat strange that this form of indictment should not have come into use by manufacturers for the purpose of protecting their trade marks. It may, however, be accounted for on the ground that an action-at-law for damages, if successful, gives a more ample compensation for the violation of their rights. It is this action, in its form and separate parts, that we have next to consider.

II. We have seen that the form of action adopted in vindication of the right to use a trade mark, is that of an action upon the case for deceit, and that in this action fraud is of the essence of the injury. There are, therefore, two main points to be proved, the fraudulent nature of the wrong committed by the defendant, and the nature of the injury suffered by the plaintiff. The nature of the wrong to be proved is well defined by Wilde, C. J., in the case of Rodgers v. Nowell, 5 C. B. 109; he says, “Has more ever been necessary to be proved in actions of this description than that the plaintiff, being a manufacturer, has been accustomed to use a certain mark to denote that the goods so marked were of his manufacture; that such mark was well known and understood in the particular trade; and that the defendants had adopted the mark, and sold goods bearing it as and for the plaintiff’s goods, with intent to deceive?” On these grounds the action was held not to be maintainable in Singleton v. Bolton, 3 Doug. 293, for there no sale was proved to have been made by the defendant of a medicament (Yellow Ointment) of his own under the name or mark of the plaintiff, but both plaintiff and defendant used the name of the original inventor (Dr. Johnson) and no evidence was given of the defendant having sold his ointment as if it had been prepared by the plaintiff. So also in the case of Crawshay v. Thompson, 4 M. & G. 357, it was held that the mark used by the defendants was not used with the intention of supplanting the plaintiffs, but that it was applied to certain goods in the ordinary course of business, and in execution of orders. This decision is grounded on the evidence in the case as to the fraudulent use of the mark (which was alleged by the plaintiffs in their declaration), and turns on the question of what constituted such a fraudulent use. It seems clear from the statement of the case, that there was no proof of an intention on the part of the defendants to sell their manufacture, which was iron in bars, stamped with a particular stamp for the Turkish market, as and for the iron made by the plaintiff; but it was contended that their motive in using the mark or stamp was immaterial, if the resemblance in fact existed, and they were aware of it. Here the case of Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 114, was cited to show that a fraud at law was committed where a representation is made which a party knows to be untrue, and which is calculated from the mode in which it is made to induce another to act on the faith of it so that he may incur damage; the intention to defraud being presumed from the act of misrepresentation. It was considered, however, in Crawshay v. Thompson that there was no evidence to show that the defendants really believed that persons might be imposed upon by their using the mark complained of; and it was even held that a letter addressed by the plaintiff to the defendants, complaining of their use of the mark in question, and designating it as “a palpable fraud” upon him, did not necessarily affect them with notice of resemblance, and with a consequent fraud;

the evidence in the case having satisfied the jury that the statement of the plaintiff was not believed, or admitted by the defendants.

The fact that the name used by the defendants to distinguish their manufacture is really their own, though it be that of the plaintiff also, is not sufficient to rebut the charge of fraudulent intention. In Sykes v. Sykes, 3 B. & C. 541, where one of the defendants was named Sykes, and contended that he had a right to mark certain shot-belts, powder-flasks, &c., with that name, it was held such a use of a name might, of itself, be sufficient to show a fraudulent intention. Rodgers v. Nowill (sup.), also decides the same point.

The case of Sykes v. Sykes (sup.), is also important as showing that the misrepresentation need not be immediate in order to give a ground of action. It was there proved on the defence that the sale of the spurious article was made to retail dealers, who were aware of the fraud; but it was held that the sale to them for the purpose of a resale to the public, who would be deceived by the pirated stamp, was substantially the same thing as a direct fraud by the original vendor.

The nature of the wrong suffered by the trader whose mark is fraudulently used, is twofold. Either it consists in the injury to his reputation where an article of inferior value is palmed off upon the purchaser, as was considered to be the ground of action in the case cited in Southern v. How, 1 Pop. 143; or else in the injury done to his trade by general loss of custom. It is quite clear that at the present time, whatever may have been the opinion of the courts of law formerly, the latter is a sufficient ground of action. This point is sufficiently shown in Blofield v. Payne, 4 B. & Ad. 410, (see also, Rodgers v. Nowill, sup.), where it was held that a verdict for nominal damages was sufficient to maintain the statement in the declaration of the damage suffered by the plaintiff. It is, however, necessary for the plaintiff to show that an actual damage has been suffered. In Lawson v. The Bank of London, 18 C. B. 84, upon a declaration that the plaintiff has established a bank in London, called "The Bank of London," and was the first person who had established a bank by or under that name; and had established the said bank at a great expense, and caused the name to be published and affixed on the offices of the said bank, and had issued prospectuses with that title, whereby he had acquired and was acquiring great gains and profits; and upon the further statement that by the defendant's use of a similar title to their bank, the plaintiff had been deprived of his profits, it was held that the action would not lie. It appeared from the evidence that this was a contest between rival banking schemes; that the plaintiff had not established himself as a banker in such a way as to entitle him to complain of the defendant's conduct in using the same name for their bank, and that, in fact, he had never actually carried on business, so that his loss of profit was merely contingent.

A question has been raised as to costs in these cases which is decided in Morison v. Salmon, 2 M. & S. 385. It appears from that case that under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, by which a judge is empowered to certify for costs in any case in which the damages are laid by the jury under 40s., it is not necessary to show that a right was actually involved in the action in order to entitle the plaintiff to the judge's certificate. It is quite sufficient that there is a possibility that such a right may be involved; so that in cases of the fraudulent use of a trade mark, where it is a fair inference that a right may come in question, as in the instance of the trial of the right to use the particular mark under a direction from a Court of Equity to try such a right; or a general right to protection against the fraud of other traders, the plaintiff may obtain his costs, even though the jury find that the damage he has suffered is merely nominal.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

(Sittings in Error).

May 23. — The Lord Chief Baron announced that the Court would sit in error from the Queen's Bench on the first two days after term; on errors from the Common Pleas on the two next days; and on errors from the Exchequer on the two following days; and if there should be a necessity for it, the Court would adjourn so as to get rid of all the errors before the long vacation.

Recent Decisions.

EQUITY.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT — TRUSTEE SOLICITOR — PARTNERSHIP OF SOLICITORS.

Clack v. Carlon, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 569.

Some time ago* we discussed rather at length the doctrine of courts of equity relating to the right of solicitor-trustees, who are employed professionally in the business of their trust, to make the usual professional charges for such business. At present we need only say that, although prior to the decision of Lord Lyndhurst in New v. Jones, 1 Mc. N. & G. 568 (n) the rule that a solicitor-trustee cannot charge for professional services unless the contrary is expressly provided for by the trust instrument was somewhat uncertain, since the decision in that case it has been well established and often recognised. Since that decision, however, a question as to the rights of partnership firms, where one of the partners is a trustee, has been frequently raised; and in a late important case (Broughton v. Broughton, 5 D. M. & G. 160), upon this question, the rule of the Court was carried as far as it could well be by Lord Cranworth. The first case in which it was attempted to insist upon the distinction between the employment of a solicitor-trustee and a firm of which he was a member, was Collins v. Carey, 2 Beav. 128. It was there argued on behalf of a partner who was not a trustee, that he at least ought not to be deprived of his share of the costs upon the ground that his partner was a trustee. But Lord Langdale refused to recognise the distinction, and considering the case to come within the general rule laid down in New v. Jones, only allowed in passing the trustee's accounts the actual costs which had been paid out of pocket. The general rule is now well established that a trustee acting as solicitor in trust matters is entitled only to costs out of pocket, although, as Lord Langdale observed in Bainbrigge v. Blair, that "where a trust being in the course of execution, and many things remaining to be done which can be done beneficially only by a particular trustee, who cannot from his situation do it without grievous personal loss, the Court considering what is beneficial to the cestuique trusts, may give 'proper remuneration' to a solicitor-trustee, although it will not allow him to make the usual professional charges." A distinction has been established by the case of Burge v. Brutton, 2 Hare 373; as to the payment of costs in a cause, between the case of an executor-solicitor in the cause which he would be entitled to receive if he had not been in a fiduciary position, and the costs which as executor-solicitor he was entitled to receive. In that case the executor-solicitor who was a party to the cause in his representative character, although he was allowed personally as against the estate such costs only as he actually paid, was nevertheless held entitled to be allowed that proportion of the whole costs which his town agent in the cause was entitled to receive. The case of a town agent is thus distinguished from that of a partner of the trustee. In two or three other reported cases the question of the effect of partnership was incidentally touched upon, but except the case mentioned below, and the case of Collins v. Carey there has been no distinct decision upon this point until that of Wood, V.C., in the above-named case of Clack v. Carlon. In Christopher v. White (10 Beav. 523), which does not appear to have been cited in Clack v. Carlon, two solicitors were members of a firm; the one who was a trustee did not interfere in the professional business of the trust, which was done by the other partner; and there Lord Langdale only allowed in the taxation of costs the costs out of pocket, at least during the lifetime of the solicitor-trustee.

In Clack v. Carlon the firm of solicitors Messrs Carlon and Haynes, consisted of two gentlemen of these names. Mr. Carlon was appointed trustee of a creditor's deed in respect of which a suit arose, and the questions whether Mr. Carlon was entitled to costs beyond the amount actually paid out of pocket, and whether his partner, Mr. Haynes, was entitled to anything more in respect of the trust business in the suit, were there discussed and decided. There had been an express agreement between the partners that Mr. Haynes should in all matters connected with the trust act as Carlon's solicitor, and that the latter should have no interest in the profits of such business. The Vice-Chancellor considered that it was quite competent to the partner to enter into such an agreement. His Honour saw no ground for saying that a solicitor-trustee might not make an arrangement with his partner to treat him as a stranger in the management of a particular business. If the partner did not take all the profit himself, but made an arrangement to share it with the trustee, then there would be a fraud; but in this case there was no reason to suppose that any irregularity existed. He knew no reason why two firms might not come to a mutual arrangement, each to transact the business of the other. In the same way, two members of the same firm might enter into such a bargain. The Vice-Chancellor, therefore, declared that from the time that Mr. Haynes was acting under the agreement with his partner he was entitled to his full costs.

CHARGE OF LEGACIES ON REAL ESTATE BY IMPLICATION.

Field v. Peckett, M. R., 9 W. R. 525.

The foundation of the doctrine by which the above case has been decided was laid in the much debated case of Kidney v. Cousmaker, 1 Ves. 436, 2 Ves. 267. In that case a testator devised real estate to trustees upon trust to sell and dispose of the produce, first to discharge all incumbrances affecting the same estates, and then to invest the overplus "in trust for such persons, in such proportions and such manner and form in all respects as I have hereafter directed concerning the residue of my personal estate, it being my intent and meaning that such overplus money shall go with and be considered as part of the residue and surplus of my personal estate." After making various dispositions, the testator gave the rest, residue and surplus of his personal estate, after payment of his debts, &c., and legacies aforesaid, upon trust, to pay an annuity to his wife and another annuity for the maintenance of his daughters, "and to pay all and every part of his said residuary estate," subject to his wife's annuity, to his two daughters in moieties at twenty-one or marriage. The testator declared that until the real estate directed to be sold should be sold the rents and profits should be applied in discharge of the interest upon the mortgages, and the surplus to such purposes as thereinbefore directed concerning the interest of his residuary personal estate. He appointed the trustees named in his will to be his executors. One of his daughters died under age and unmarried. There were simple contract creditors to a large amount beyond what the personal estate would satisfy, who claimed to have their debts paid out of the surplus of the money arising from the sale of the real estates after discharging the incumbrances upon them. The surviving daughter, as sole heiress and residuary legatee, claimed the whole surplus. The case was first heard before Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who said the question was, "Whether the gift of the residue of the personal estate meant purely a description of the fund he was to give, containing the charges only as part of the description, or a created charge, by which he intended to give the whole, in which he has directly included the surplus of the produce of the real estate, expressly burdened with those charges. . . . Could it be contended that after declaring the surplus of the real estate to be in the same condition as the surplus of the personal, both should not be charged alike? That could not be so contended. . . . Therefore I think here all the charges operated and were introduced by the word "after" The ground I go upon is this, that the words "residue and surplus" of the personal, mentioned in the first clause, with which he has combined this overplus, must mean the same thing as the words, "rest, residue, and surplus" of the personal in that clause where it is directed to be disposed of and subjected to certain burdens of which the debts and legacies make part. Upon the whole, therefore, this surplus must be deemed subject to these charges. The case was reheard before Lord Chancellor Loughborough, who said that his predecessor's authority was a strong preservative against any disposition to doubt. He considered that the general object of the will was to throw the whole of the property, freehold, leasehold, and personal, into one mass, and to dispose of it all as personal. It was an important circumstance that the real estate was devised to the executors to be sold. That proved the general intention that those who were to be in the management of the property should manage it all as that fund which was to be managed by executors. "It is not going a great way too far to say that where real estate is devised to executors, and there is a declaration that they shall sell, and the produce shall go as the residue of the personal estate, that it shall go subject to all that would affect the residue of the personal estate, i. e., to debts." These words of Lord Loughborough were lately quoted by the Master of the Rolls as decisive of the case before him. The decree under rehearing was affirmed, and it was again affirmed on appeal to the House of Lords, so that the case is one of the highest authority, although the reasoning employed in it is not conclusive. That reasoning has been adopted in later cases rather for the sake of uniformity of decision than because of its intrinsic force. It extended, as has been seen, both to debts and legacies, although the case before the Court only called for a decision as regarded debts. If the decision had been the other way those debts would have remained unsatisfied, and one cannot but suspect that this consideration operated insensibly with the judges who successively heard the case. In Lord Thurlow's own words, "The Court has leaned that way, if we may be allowed to say so."

The argument against the view adopted in the above case was very forcibly urged by Lord Wensleydale in the House of Lords, in the Irish case of Greville v. Brown, 7 H. L. Ca. 689; 4 W. R. 673; but this argument was overruled by the majority of the learned lords present. In that case a testator gave an annuity charged on his real estate, and he also gave legacies, and as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of his property, of what nature soever, he gave the same to his son. After the testator's death the son mortgaged the real estate, which was subsequently sold in the Incumbered Estates Court for a sum less than the mortgage. The Commissioner, and afterwards the Irish Court of Appeal in Chancery, had held that a legatee was entitled to priority over the mortgagee; and an appeal was now brought against this decision to the House of Lords. The question here only regarded legacies. As regards debts the statute 3 & 4 W. 4 c. 104, has rendered it unnecessary in general to resort to the doctrine of Kidney v. Cousmaker. Lord Wensleydale said that in the absence of that and other authorities he should not have entertained any doubt as to the meaning of the will before him. He should have thought the meaning was simply to leave the rest of the personal estate minus the charge on the personal estate, and the rest of the real estate minus the charge on the real estate. "I should never," said he, "have dreamt that the testator meant to say that the charge upon the personal estate was to be transferred to the real estate. My doubt is whether any such principle has been established as that because a testator happens to mention real and personal property in one category, therefore all the property is liable for the legacies." The opposite and prevailing view was stated by Lord Chancellor Campbell thus: "If there be a general gift of legacies, and then the testator gives the rest and residue of his property, real and personal, the legacies are to come out of the mass. The whole is one mass, part of which is represented by legacies, and what is afterwards given is minus what was before given, and, therefore, subject to the prior gift." If this be not good reasoning it is at any rate good law. The Lord Chancellor's meaning may be stated by the help of symbols thus. Let a represent the realty, b the annuities or legacies charged upon it, c the personality, and d the legacies given without any express charge. Then the residuary devisee and legatee takes (a-b) plus (c-d), which is algebraically equal to (a plus c)—(b plus d).

In the case lately before the Master of the Rolls the magnitude of the legacies in question seems to have furnished the chief reason for reopening a controversy which had been so deliberately decided in the House of Lords. The testator in that case bequeathed to his trustees a sum of £20,000 for the benefit of a married couple and their children, and on failure of children to fall into his residuary personal estate. He then gave three other sums, amounting together to £55,000, on similar trusts, for the benefit of other persons and their children. He also gave £10,000 for the benefit of another person and her children, and on failure of children "to sink into and form part of the residue of my estate and effects for the benefit of the several legatees entitled thereto as hereinafter mentioned." After giving various legacies the testator devised his freehold estate to his trustees upon trust to sell the same, with a declaration that it should be considered as converted in equity from the time of his decease. And he directed that the money to arise by such sale "should be added to and in all respects be deemed part of his residuary personal estate thereinafter bequeathed, and should be subject to the trusts and disposition thereinafter contained," viz., a trust for division into five equal parts. The trustees were appointed executors. The personal estate was insufficient by a large amount to pay the legacies, and the question therefore arose whether such legacies were charged on the real estate. The Master of the Rolls appeared to attach some importance to the direction that the real estate should be treated as converted in equity from the death, and also to the identity of the executors and trustees; but, even without these circumstances, the case clearly falls within the established rule. "The testator directed that the proceeds of the sale of the real estate should be deemed part of his residuary personal estate." How was this residuary estate to be ascertained? It meant whatever remained after all proper charges had been discharged. There is no doubt that this reasoning was exactly applicable to the case, and the reasoning itself no lawyer can now venture to impugn.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF MASTER AND SERVANT—WHEN THE FORMER IS LIABLE FOR THE TRESPASS OF THE LATTER.

Seymour v. Greenwood, Exch., 9 W. R., 548.

We had occasion recently to speak of the liability of a master on contracts made by his servant.* The present case illustrates the nature of his liability for wrongful acts committed by his servant. With regard to these the general rule is that the master is answerable in all cases for the act of his servant if done by his command, either expressly given or implied—the maxim of law, qui facit per alium, facit per se, making the master, under these circumstances, answerable. Hence, if the servant do wrong by his master's command (whether it amount to an actual trespass or not) the master or the servant, or both, may be sued; but the law goes further than this, and makes the master liable for all that the servant does in the course of his employment (although not specifically ordered to do the injurious act complained of), provided always the act be not wilful and malicious on the part of the servant—in which case the master is not liable if he has neither commanded nor encouraged it, even though it was done in the course of or relation to the service.

It appears from the judgment of the Chief Baron in the present case, that these principles have not always been so well defined in our law as they are at present. At the commencement of the present century, it seems to have been thought that the master was not liable for the trespass of his servant, unless accompanied by his specific direction or assent (see M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106), although he has always been held liable for the servant's negligent performance of his orders. But the Chief Baron remarked that since this and similar cases "the law has been very much expanded," and that "public safety and convenience require that we should adopt the kind of decision to which we now give effect; for if we were to hold that the master was to be responsible only in cases of a negligent obedience to orders, persons would not be protected against many irregularities, such as may happen in conducting the business of railways, against which it is extremely important they should be protected."

The particular circumstances of the present case were shortly these. A drunken man had been ejected from the omnibus of the defendant by the conductor with unnecessary violence. It was admitted that the act of expulsion itself was justifiable; but the master was held liable for the injury occasioned by the manner in which it was done. The argument on the other side was that the master was not liable for the assault committed by the servant in the execution of his duty; but this was overruled on the grounds indicated in the Chief Baron's judgment.

LAW OF ARBITRATION—STATEMENT OF SPECIAL CASE WHEN COMPULSORY.

Baguley v. Markwick, C. P., 9 W. R. 537.

The provisions with regard to arbitration in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, are singularly confused—a confusion which is generally understood to have arisen from some accidental displacement in committee of certain of the clauses intended to operate exclusively upon compulsory arbitrations. The present application was probably caused by the difficulties of construction thus occasioned. By sect. 4 a judge may direct an arbitrator to state a special case to obtain the decision of the Court on some matter of law arising on some particular item or items of an account. This provision, however, from its context, applies only to a compulsory reference, and no power exists (as it seems) to order an arbitrator appointed by the parties to state a case, though by sect. 5 an arbitrator generally may, in his discretion, state his award in the form of a special case. Then by sect. 8 the Court has power to remit a matter to the reconsideration of an arbitrator. Such being the effect of the provisions, in the present case a matter was compulsorily referred to a master, who neglected (though requested) to state his award in the form of a special case, so as to raise a point of law urged before him; but gave his certificate instead, in favour of one of the parties. The Court refused to remit the matter to the master after his duties had thus terminated by his making an award, in order that an application might be made to the Court for an order under sect. 4 that a special case should be stated by him; but the Chief Justice intimated that if the application for such an order had been made pending the arbitration it might, perhaps, have been entertained, as the reference was a compulsory one.

Correspondence.

COMMON LAW JUDGES.

Allow me to call your attention to a very inconvenient practice existing in the common law courts. I refer to the judges delivering their judgments in cases where they have reserved their decision without any previous notice whatever being given to either counsel or attorneys concerned.

It frequently happens that judgment is not delivered for many days (and sometimes weeks) after the argument, and as there is no mode of obtaining any information on the subject, it becomes requisite to attend daily at Westminster during the interval, or the chances are it may be delivered without any one concerned being present, as was actually the case in a cause in which the firm I represent were recently engaged.

In the equity courts it is the practice to give notice before a judgment is delivered, and why, should not the like be done in common law? It seems to me that something should be done to remedy the evil.

A MANAGING COMMON LAW CLERK.

STATE OF CHANCERY BUSINESS.

Punch presented us last winter with a humorous group of starved-out chancery barristers. The hard frost was supposed to have reduced below zero the hot blood of litigants, or that angelic charity which is so often recommended to others and neglected by ourselves was thought to have at last had her virtues recognised, and to have produced such a brotherly love amongst mankind that no more were they to file bills in chancery one against another as they were used to do. Grass was to grow in Chancery-lane, and the site of the new law courts be laid out as a flower garden. This kind of notion seems to have spread, and continued to the present, and reports were current till lately that the equity judges would sit but three days a-week, and start on their summer journey to the Highlands or elsewhere a good month sooner than usual.

How much truth there is in all this will be seen from the following table of cases standing for hearing before the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors now and at this time last year.

Causes standing for hearing on the 1st day of Trinity Term, 1860, and the 1st day of Trinity Term 1861, respectively.

	Trinity Term, 1860.	Trinity Term, 1861.

V. C. Kindersley.....	53	52
V. C. Stuart	60	89
V. C. Wood.....	139	103

From this it will be seen that the number of causes is just five fewer than at the corresponding period of 1860, and I believe too there is a larger proportion than usual of causes to be heard for the first time, and fewer on further directions and exceptions, in which case the present list probably represents a larger amount of work for the court to get through than it had a twelvemonth ago when no scarcity was heard of.

THE LATE BARON WATSON.

I have just returned from a three days' holiday in Wales, and finding myself whilst there in the burial ground of Christ Church, at Welshpool, I was desirous of paying a visit to the grave of the lamented Baron Watson, who, it will be remembered, expired in the Assize Court at Welshpool, immediately after charging the grand jury, in the spring of 1860; I looked in vain however for anything to direct me to find the grave, when a friend came to my assistance and pointed out two mounds in a very neglected state, and said it was one of those, but was not certain which. There is no tomb-stone, or head-stone, nor even a shrub or flower on the grave, nothing but grass and weeds to mark the last resting-place of an accomplished lawyer and gentleman, and an upright and learned English judge, cut off so awfully sudden as poor Baron Watson was.

I have just referred to your notice of the deceased Baron in the Solicitors' Journal of March 17th, 1860, wherein you feelingly observe that he was "a just and true-hearted man, and many will mourn him;" and it may be that many do mourn him, but why not show it by at least one method?—that of marking and beautifying the grave, a mark of respect and affection paid to, and by, even the very poorest of our fellow countrymen.

A SUBSCRIBER.

Ireland.

The Government have at length disposed of the Crown Solicitorships left vacant since the death of Sir Matthew Barrington. Cork has been given to Mr. Gilman, Limerick, to Mr. William Roche, and Kerry with Clare to Mr. A. Morphy, each solicitor having a salary of £900 a-year, out of which he will have to defray all necessary expenses.

Obituary.

THE LATE THOMAS CHAPMAN, ESQ.

Mr. Chapman recently departed this life at his residence in Westbourne-terrace, in the 82nd year of his age. He commenced his legal career in the office of the then well-known firm of Hemming & Baxter, Lincoln's-inn-fields. He practised for a few years in partnership with a Mr. Hughes. Many years ago, he was appointed Assistant Master in the Queen's Bench, Master Le Blanc then being the principal master. As master he sat underneath three Chief Justices, viz., Lords Ellenborough, Tenterden, and Denman. While he held this appointment he published a "Book of the Practice of the Queen's Bench." In 1834, on the death of Mr. Jones, the then Marshal, Mr. Chapman was appointed, without the slightest solicitation, by Lord Denman, Marshal of the Queen's Bench Prison, an appointment then worth about £2,000 or £3,000 per annum, but subject to great risks.

As Master, few men have been held in higher esteem than Mr. Chapman was. As Marshal, though firm in his government, he was much respected by the unfortunate inmates of the prison, many of whom obtained their release through his appeals to their creditors, or by means supplied from his own purse.

Among the court prisoners during his term of office were the late Lord Waldegrave and Captain Duff for an assault. The most unpleasant duty that he had to perform was that of carrying out the sentence of death on two murderers brought by habeas from Chester Gaol, on the conflict between the sheriffs of the county and city, as to which the duty devolved on.

Soon after the passing of the Act (1843) for consolidating the Queen's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons, Mr. Chapman resigned the appointment, and received a pension of £900 per annum for life. Long before this he had inherited a large fortune. When he resigned, a handsome address was presented to him by the prisoners. During his tenure of office he was subject to numerous actions, as the report books testify.

His active mind and business habits well qualified him for the duties of a magistrate. His opinions were much respected on the Kingston (Surrey) bench, of which he was a member. He had three sons at the bar, but only one (now deceased) ever practised.

Review.

Succession Duty Discount Tables, for calculating the Amount of Discount to be allowed on Successions to Real and Leasehold Estates, where it is desired to pay the Duty in Advance, under the Provisions of the 40th Section of the Statute 16 & 17 Victoria, Chapter 51. By AN ACCOUNTANT. Stevens & Sons. 1861.

The 21st section of the Succession Duty Act declares that the interest of a "successor" in real property shall be considered as an annuity equal to the annual value for his life, or for any lesser period during which he shall be entitled thereto, and the value of such annuity shall be calculated by the tables annexed to the Succession Duty Act.

By sect. 40 of said Act it is declared that "it shall be lawful for the commissioners to receive any duty tendered to them in advance, and to allow discount thereon at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, or at such other rate as may from time to time be directed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury; and no person, by reason of his having made any payment of duty in advance, shall be prejudiced in his right to have any repayment of duty made to him to which he may become entitled under any of the provisions of this Act."

In the majority of cases it will be the desire, as well as the interest, of every successor to pay the whole of such duty in one payment rather than at eight several periods, as provided by the statute, and so to avail himself of the provisions of the above section; but the calculation of the discount on eight several sums, payable at eight different periods, occupies much time, and it is therefore conceived that these tables, with the accompanying scale, will be of great service to persons succeeding to property, solicitors, agents, and others concerned in the payment of the duties levied on all successions to real property. The scale has been prepared calculating the rate of discount at four per cent., as the rate will not probably be varied.

"ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

The Bishop of Salisbury has determined upon instituting legal proceedings in the Court of Arches against Dr. Rowland Williams, author of one of the "Essays and Reviews," on a charge of heretical teaching. For those of our readers who take an interest in the question, we make the following extract from an article on the "Essays and Reviews" considered in relation to the legal liabilities of the writers, in the last number of the Law Magazine:—

The question of the legal responsibility of those whose theological views differ from the opinions commonly held, or at least commonly expressed, has in fact been considered to some extent by one of the essayists—Mr. Wilson—in his article on the national church, and we will therefore first draw attention to his views on the subject. "It may be worth while," he says, "to consider how far a liberty of opinion is conceded by our existing laws, civil and ecclesiastical. Along with great openings for freedom, it will be found there are some restraints, or appearances of restraints, which require to be removed.

"As far as opinion privately entertained is concerned, the liberty of the English clergyman appears already to be complete; for no ecclesiastical person can be obliged to answer interrogations as to his opinions, nor be troubled for that which he has not actually expressed, nor be made responsible for inferences which other people may draw from his expressions." [To this passage the following note is appended—"The oath ex officio in the ecclesiastical law, is defined to be an oath whereby any person may be obliged to make any presentment of any crime or offence, or to confess or accuse himself or herself of any criminal matter or thing, whereby he or she may be liable to any censure, penalty, or punishment whatsoever, 4 Jac.: 'The lords of the council at Whitehall demanded of Popham and Coke, chief-justices, upon motion made by the Commons in Parliament, in what cases the ordinary may examine any person ex officio upon oath.' They answered—'. That the ordinary cannot constrain any man, ecclesiastical or temporal, to swear generally to answer such interrogations as shall be administered to him, &c. That no man, ecclesiastical or temporal, shall be examined upon the secret thoughts of his heart, or of his secret opinion; but something ought to be objected against him which he hath spoken or done. Thus, 13 Jac., Dighton and Holt were committed by the high commissioners, because, being convented for slanderous words against the book of Common Prayer and the government of the Church, and being tendered the oath to be examined, they refused. The case being brought before the King's Bench on habeas corpus, Coke C. J. gave the determination of the Court, 'That they ought to be delivered, because their examination is made to cause them to accuse themselves of a breach of a penal law, which is against law; for they ought to proceed against them by witnesses, and not enforce them to take an oath to accuse themselves.' Then, by 13 Car. II., c. 12, it was enacted, 'That it shall not be lawful for any person, exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to tender or administer to any person whatsoever the oath usually called the oath ex officio, or any other oath, whereby such person, to whom the same is tendered or administered, may be charged or compelled to confess or accuse, or to purge himself or herself, of any criminal matter or thing,' &c.—Burn's Eccles. Law, iii. 14, 15, ed. Phillimore.]

"Still," continues Mr. Wilson, "though there may be no power of inquisition into the private opinions either of ministers or people in the Church of England, there may be some interference in the expression of them; and a great restraint is supposed to be imposed upon the clergy by reason of their subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles. Yet it is more difficult than might be expected to define what is the extent of the legal obligat on of those who sign them; and in this case the strictly legal obligation is the measure of the moral one. Subscription may be thought even to be inoperative upon the conscience by reason of its vagueness; for the act of subscription is enjoined, but its effect or meaning nowhere plainly laid down; and it does not seem to amount to more than an acceptance of the Articles of the Church, as the formal law to which the subscriber is, in some sense, subject. What that subjection amounts to must be gathered elsewhere, for it does not appear on the face of the subscription itself."

The fifth and thirty-sixth canons are those which contain the ecclesiastical law on this head. Canon five is entitled "Impugners of the Articles of Religion established in the Church of England censured." It provides "that whosoever shall hereafter affirm that any of the Nine-and-thirty Articles agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation holden at London in the year of our Lord God 1562, for avoiding diversities of opinion, and for the establishing of consent touching true religion, are in any part superstitious or erroneous, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto; let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored but only by the archbishop, after his repentance and public revocation of such his wicked errors." This canon, it must be observed, refers to laymen as well as the clergy. "Whoever" impugns the Thirty-nine Articles is to be excommunicated; and if, indeed, it be a wicked thing to impugn any of these Articles, how much more criminal are they in authority who, neglecting their duty in this behalf, take no steps to purify the Church by punishing the multitude of malignants who, we fear, still mingle in society, instead of being rejected and branded as excommunicants. We could mention whole firms of "impugning" attorneys, and staircases full of "impugning" counsel, who ought, if the Church did its duty, to be excommunicated, nor received again till they had walked barefoot from Temple Bar to Westminster, confessing their iniquities.

Upon this fifth canon Mr. Wilson observes that we must determine what is the proper definition of the word "impugning." The canon states it to be the affirming that any of the Thirty-nine Articles are in any part "superstitious or erroneous." But, says he, "an Article may be very inexpedient, or become so; may be unintelligible, or not easily intelligible to ordinary people; it may be controversial, and such as to provoke controversy, and keep it alive when otherwise it would subside; it may revive unnecessarily the remembrance of dead controversies, all or any of these, without being 'erroneous;' and, though not 'superstitious,' some expressions may appear so—such as those which seem to impute an occult operation to the sacraments. The fifth canon does not touch the affirming any of these things, and more especially that the Articles present truths disproportionally and relatively to ideas not now current."

There is, however, yet the thirty-sixth canon, which presents like difficulties to the fifth, but does not affect those who have accepted office in good faith, but those only who purpose to enter office, and who must, as a condition precedent, subscribe.

It therefore does not directly belong to the question of the legal liability of the six clerical essayists; but it is indirectly a part of the question, and it is claimed on their behalf, that the theological opinions which they profess would not be incompatible with their right to subscribe according to the provision of this canon. The thirty-sixth canon is entitled "Subscription required of such as are to be made ministers," and it is thus worded:—"No person shall hereafter be received into the ministry, nor either by institution or collation admitted to any ecclesiastical living, nor suffered to preach, to catechise, or to be a lecturer or reader of divinity, in either university, or in any cathedral or collegiate church, city, or market-town, parish church, chapel, or in any other place within this realm, except he be licensed either by the archbishop or by the bishop of the diocese where he is to be placed, under their hands and seals, or by one of the two universities under their seal likewise; and except he shall first subscribe to these three articles following, in such manner and sort as we have here appointed.

"1. That the King's Majesty, under God, is the only supreme governor of this realm, and of all other his Highness's dominions and countries, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal; and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within his Majesty's said realms, dominions, and countries.

"2. That the Book of Common Prayer, and the ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the word of God, and that it may lawfully so be used; and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed, in public prayer, and administration of the sacraments, and none other.

"3. That he alloweth the Book of Articles of Religion, agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy in the convocation holden at London in the year of our Lord God one thousand five hundred sixty and two; and that he acknowledgeth all and every the Articles therein contained, being in number nine-and-thirty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable to the word of God.

"To these three Articles whosoever will subscribe he shall, for the avoiding of all ambiguities, subscribe in this order and form of words, setting down both his Christian and surname—viz., I, N. N., do willingly and ex animo subscribe to these three Articles above mentioned, and to all things that are contained in them. And if any bishop shall ordain, admit, or license any as is aforesaid, except he first have subscribed in manner and form as here we have appointed, he shall be suspended from giving of orders and licenses to preach for the space of twelve months. But if either of the universities shall offend therein, we leave them to the danger of the law and his Majesty's censure."

On this canon Mr. Wilson comments, observing that its two clauses are explanatory, to some extent, of the meaning of ministerial subscription, "That he alloweth the Book of Articles," &c.; and "that he acknowledgeth the same to be agreeable to the word of God." "We 'allow' many things," says he, "which we do not think wise or practically useful—as the loss of two evils, or an evil which cannot be remedied, or of which the remedy is not attainable, or is uncertain in its operation, or is not in our power, or concerning which there is much difference of opinion; or where the initiation of any change does not belong to ourselves, nor the responsibility belongs to ourselves, either of the things as they are, or of searching for something better. Many acquiesce in, submit to, 'allow' a law, as it operates upon themselves, which they would be horror-struck to have enacted; yet they would gladly and in conscience 'allow' and submit to it as part of a constitution under which they live, against which they would never think of rebelling, which they would on no account undermine, for the many blessings of which they are fully grateful; they would be silent and patient rather than join, even in appearance, the disturbers and breakers of its laws. Secondly, he 'acknowledgeth' the same to be agreeable to the word of God. Some distinctions may be founded upon the word 'acknowledge.' He does not maintain nor regard it as self-evident, nor originate it as his own feeling, spontaneous opinion, or conviction; but when it is suggested to him, put in a certain shape; when the intention of the framers is borne in mind, their probable purpose and design explained, together with the difficulties which surrounded them, he is not prepared to contradict, and he acknowledges. There is a great deal to be said which had not at first occurred to him. Many other better and wiser men than himself have acknowledged the same thing: why should he be obstinate? Besides, he is young, and has plenty of time to re-consider it; or he is old, and continues to submit out of habit, and it would be too absurd, at his time of life, to be setting up as a Church reformer. But, after all, the important phrase is that the Articles are 'agreeable to the word of God.' This cannot mean that the Articles are precisely co-extensive with the Bible, much less of equal authority with it as a whole. Neither separately nor altogether do they embody all which is said in it; and inferences which they draw from it are only good relatively, and secundum quid and quatenus concordant. If their terms are biblical terms, they must be presumed to have the same sense in the Articles which they have in the Scripture; and, if they are not all scriptural ones, they undertake in the pivot Article not to contradict the Scripture. The Articles do not make any assumption of being interpretations of Scripture, or developments of it. The greater must include the less; and the Scripture is the greater.

"On the other hand, there may be some things in the Articles, which could not be contained, or have not been contained in the Scripture; such as propositions or clauses concerning historical facts more recent than the Scripture itself: for instance, that there never has been any doubt in the church concerning the books of the New Testament. For, without including such doubts as a fool might have, or a very conceited person; without carrying doubts, founded upon mere criticism and internal evidence only, to such an extent as a Baur, or even an Ewald—there was a time when certain books existed, and certain others were not as yet written; for example, the Epistles of St. Paul were anterior, probably to all of the Gospels, certainly to that of St. John; and of course the church could not receive without doubt books not as yet composed. But as the canon grew, book after book emerging into existence and general reception, there were doubts as to some of them, for a longer or shorter period, either concerning their authorship or their authority. The framers of the Articles were not deficient in learning, and could not have been ignorant of the passages in Eusebius, where the different books current in Christendom in his time are classified as genuine or acknowledged doubtful and spurious. If there be an erroneousness in such a statement, as that there never was any doubt in the church concerning the Book of the Revelation, the Epistle to the Hebrews, or the second of St. Peter, it cannot be an erroneousness in the sense of the fifth canon, nor can it be at variance with the word of God according to the thirty-sixth. Such things in the Articles as are beside the Scripture are not in the contemplation of the canons. Much less can historical questions, not even hinted at in the Articles, be excluded from free discussion; such as concern the dates and composition of the several books and compilation of the Pentateuch, the introduction of Daniel into the Jewish canon, and the like, with some books of the New Testament,—the date and authorship, for instance, of the fourth Gospel.

"Many of those who would themselves wish the Christian theology to run on in its old forms of expression, nevertheless, deal with the opinions of others, which they may think objectionable, fairly as opinions. There will always, on the other hand, be a few whose favourite mode of warfare it will be to endeavour to gain a victory over some particular person who may hold opinions they dislike, by entangling him in the formularies. Nevertheless, our formularies do not lend themselves very easily to this kind of warfare, contra retiarium baculo." (Essays and Reviews, Essay 3.)

Such is Mr. Wilson's apology for "allowing" and "acknowledging" Articles which, whatever their advantages, have at all times caused embarrassment to conscientious men who exercise honestly their thinking faculties, and which probably now induce the practice of no little casuistry. They certainly cause with many an unhealthy resolution, not to look too closely into matters which are doubtful, but rather to do as others do, and undertake a general responsibility only, in common with the rest of the world.

The following passage, affording, as it does, additional examples of the point of view from which Mr. Wilson thinks the Articles may be regarded, ought here, in fairness to himself, to be presented to the reader:—

"It may be easy," says he, "to urge invidiously, with respect to the impediments now existing to undertaking office in the national church, that there are other sects which persons dissatisfied with her formularies may join, and where they may find scope for their activity, with little intellectual bondage. Nothing can be said here, whether or not there might be, elsewhere, bondage at least as galling, of a similar or another kind. But the service of the national church may well be regarded in a different light from the service of a sect. It is as properly an organ of the national life as a magistracy or a legislative estate. To set barriers before the entrance upon its functions, by limitations not absolutely required by public policy, is to infringe upon the birthright of the citizen; and to lay down, as an alternative to striving for more liberty of thought and expression within the church of the nation, that those who are dissatisfied may sever themselves and join a sect, would be paralleled by declaring to political reformers, that they are welcome to expatriate themselves if they desire any change in the existing form of the constitution. The suggestion of the alternative is an insult; if it could be enforced it would be a grievous wrong."

The meshes of these provisions, says Mr. Wilson, are too open for modern refinement; for, not to repeat what he has already said concerning "allow" and "acknowledge," let the articles be taken according to an obvious classification.

"Forms of expression, partly derived from modern modes of thought on metaphysical subjects, partly suggested by a better acquaintance than heretofore with the unsettled state of Christian opinion in the immediately post-apostolic age, may be adopted with respect to the doctrines enunciated in the five first articles, without directly contradicting, impugning, or refusing assent to them, but passing by the side of them."

Then, with respect to what Mr. Wilson calls the pivot articles, concerning the rule of faith and the sufficiency of Scripture, he says they are "happily found to make no effectual provision for an absolute uniformity, whenever the freedom of interpretation of Scripture is admitted." Again, the articles which have a Lutheran and Calvinistic sound are found to be equally open, because they are, for the most part, founded on the very words of Scripture; and these, while worthy of unfeigned assent, are capable of different interpretations. Indeed, "the Calvinistic and Arminian views have been declared by a kind of authority to be both of them tenable under the seventeenth Article; and, if the scriptural terms of 'election' and 'predestination' may be interpreted in an anti-Calvinistic sense, 'faith,' in the tenth and following Articles, need not be understood in the Lutheran. These are instances of legitimate affixing different significations to terms in the Articles, by reason of different interpretations of Scriptural passages."

Leaving for the present the general argument, which seems more directed to what are called conscientious scruples, though in truth these ought not to be other than the legal difficulties of the case present, we will advert to the statutory enactments which are directed against clergymen who hold strange doctrines.

The 13 Eliz. c. 12, forbids, under certain penalties, the advisedly and directly contradicting any of the Articles by ecclesiastics, and requires subscription with declaration of assent from benefited persons. The section which expresses this we here subjoin:—

Section 2 enacts—"That if any person ecclesiastical, or who shall have ecclesiastical living, shall advisedly maintain or affirm any doctrine directly contrary or repugnant to any of the said Articles, and being convented before the Bishop of the diocese in ordinary, or before the Queen's Highness' Commissioners in causes ecclesiastical, shall persist therein, or not revoke his error, or, after such revocation, afterwards affirm such untrue doctrine, such maintaining or affirming and 'persisting,' or such afterwards affirming, shall be just cause to deprive such person of his ecclesiastical promotion; and it shall be lawful to the Bishop of the diocese, or the Ordinary, or the said Commissioners, to deprive such person so persisting, or lawfully convicted of such afterwards affirming; and upon such second deprivation pronounced, he shall be indeed deprived."

The 3rd section provides that no person shall be admitted to cure of souls without having subscribed, and publicly read, the Thirty-nine Articles in St. Paul's Church, with a declaration "of unfeigned assent" thereunto.

It is said in Burn's "Ecclesiastical Law" (Ed. Phillimore, 1842), that up to that date the case of the Bishop of London v. Stone (in the first volume of Dr. Haggard's Reports of Lord Stowell's decisions in the Consistory Court), was the only case reported where proceedings have been instituted against a clergyman under the above statute. In this case the offence was laid as "advisedly maintaining or affirming doctrines directly contrary to the Articles of Religion;" and Sir William Scott's judgment is worth perusing, not only as being an authority on this statute, but for the strong light in which he places the disadvantages which would arise from the preaching of diversity of doctrine, and for the manner in which he treats the whole subject.

"The purpose for which these Articles were designed," says he, "is stated to be 'the avoiding the diversities of opinion and the establishing of consent touching religion.' It is quite repugnant, therefore, to this intention, and to all rational interpretation, to contend, as we have heard this day, that the construction of the Articles should be left to the private persuasion of individuals, and that every one should be at liberty to preach doctrines contrary to those which the wisdom of the State, aided and instructed by the wisdom of the Church, had adopted. It is the idlest of all conceits that this is an obsolete Act; it is in daily use, 'viridi observantiâ,' and as much in force as any in the whole statute book, and repeatedly recommended to our attention by the injunctions of almost every sovereign who has held the sceptre of these realms.

"It is no business of mine, in this place, to vindicate the policy of any legislative act, but to enforce the observance of it. I cannot omit, however, to observe, that it is essential to the nature of every establishment, and necessary for the preservation of the interests of the laity, as well as of the clergy, that the preaching diversity of opinions shall not be fed out of the appointments of the Established Church; since the Church itself would otherwise be overwhelmed with the variety of opinion which must, in the great mass of human character, arise out of the infirmity of our common nature. For this purpose, it has been deemed expedient to the best interests of Christianity, that there should be an appointed liturgy, to which the offices of public worship should conform; and as to preaching, that it should be according to those doctrines which the State has adopted as the rational expositions of the Christian faith. It is of the utmost importance that this system should be maintained. For, what would be the state and condition of public worship, if every man was at liberty to preach from the pulpit of the church whatever doctrines he may think proper to hold? Miserable would be the condition of the laity if any such pretension could be maintained by the clergy.

"It is said, that Scripture alone is sufficient. But, though the clergy of the Church of England have been always eminently distinguished for their learning and piety, there may yet be, in such a number of persons, weak and imprudent and fanciful individuals. And what would be the condition of the Church if such person might preach whatever doctrine he thinks proper to maintain? As the law now is, every one goes to his parochial church with a certainty of not feeling any of his solemn opinions offended. If any person dissents, a remedy is provided by the mild and wise spirit of toleration which has prevailed in modern times, and which allows that he should join himself to persons of persuasions similar to his own. But that any clergyman should assume the liberty of inculcating his own private opinions, in direct opposition to the doctrines of the Established Church, in a place set apart for its own public worship, is not more contrary to the nature of a national church than to all honest and rational conduct. Nor is this restraint inconsistent with Christian liberty; for to what purpose is it directed, but to ensure, in the Established Church, that uniformity which tends to edification; leaving individuals to go elsewhere, according to the private persuasions they may entertain. It is, therefore, a restraint essential to the security of the Church, and it would be a gross contradiction to its fundamental purpose to say, that it is liable to the reproach of persecution if it does not pay its ministers for maintaining doctrines contrary to its own. I think myself bound at the same time to declare, that it is not the duty nor inclination of this court to be minute and rigid in applying proceedings of this nature; and that, if any Article is really a subject of dubious interpretation, it would be highly improper that this court should fix on one meaning, and prosecute all those who hold a contrary opinion regarding its interpretation. It is a very different thing where the authority of the Articles is totally eluded; and the party deliberately declares the intention of teaching doctrines contrary to them.

"With these observations on the law, I have only to inquire whether the doctrine which this gentleman has preached is contrary to the Articles? That will be a very short discussion on the evidence which has been laid before the court.

"The first article states the doctrine of the Trinity; the second, the Divinity of our Saviour, and the atonement by His death and sacrifice. It is alleged that Mr. Stone has, in a sermon, publicly impugned these doctrines, and that he has since committed these sentiments to the press. It is not necessary that I should state the particular terms in which these fundamental tenets have been impugned. The court has heard those observations repeated more frequently than it wished, and more than could be agreeable, it hopes, to many of the auditors. Mr. Stone himself has admitted, and is ready to admit, more so, perhaps, than those who had the management of his defence would have advised, the total opposition of his doctrines to the Articles in question. I have listened with patient attention to what he has offered this day, but I find it little more than a repetition of his sermon. It is not necessary for me to go through the rest of the evidence, or to state the facts in detail. The preaching and the publishing are both abundantly proved.

"Then, what is the duty of the court? It cannot refuse its authority to carry into effect the statutes of the land. It might proceed immediately, as suggested by the King's advocate, after the persisting in those doctrines which we have heard this day, to pronounce the sentence of the law. But the court is disposed to act with the greatest indulgence to the party, and will now content itself with admonishing him, though not encouraged to expect any effect from this admonition, to appear the next court day to revoke his errors, with an intimation that, if he does not obey this admonition, the court will feel itself under the necessity of proceeding to inflict the particular penalty which the statute directs."—(1 Hag. Cons. Rep. 424 to 430.)

On the next court day Mr. Stone tendered a paper, which the judge characterised as "a mere promise of future silence, but no revocation of past error;" and he proceeded to say, "I am therefore, under the painful necessity of considering Mr. Stone as having declined to revoke his error, and to comply with the requisition of the statute; and I must direct the registrar to record that the party has not revoked his error. It is only necessary to observe further, that by the canons of the church (can. 122) it is prescribed, that when sentence of deprivation is to be passed, which I must declare to have been incurred by this offence, it must be pronounced by the bishop." Upon which, to complete the story, it appears that the Bishop of London was introduced into court, and, to give greater solemnity to the event, he was attended by the Dean of St. Paul's and two of the prebendaries. He then took the judge's chair, and the judge explained to him the nature of the offence, and the proceedings instituted against Mr. Stone. The bishop thereupon condescended to be the organ of the court by reading and signing the sentence of deprivation.

The Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86) is the statute under which proceedings are now taken against ecclesiastics. Its provisions are most frequently resorted to to punish the immoral and vicious, but it applies equally to those disseminating damnable doctrine; and the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth, just referred to, may be enforced under the procedure enacted by the Church Discipline Act. This was decided in the judgment ex parte Denison (4 E. & B. 309.) The third section of the last-named Act of Victoria includes any clerk "charged with any offence against the law ecclesiastical"—which language, Lord Campbell, C.J., held, "must certainly comprehend the charge of having preached heretical doctrine, doctrine contrary to the formularies of the Church." It certainly, therefore, would comprehend the charge of advisedly maintaining or affirming, in the published Essays and Reviews any doctrine repugnant to the Thirty-nine Articles.

The case of Denison just referred to, arose out of the notorious dispute between him and Mr. Ditcher; and this was another instance of the law being invoked to punish a heterodox pastor. The quarrel was not allowed to be terminated by the temperate, liberal, and Christian-like interposition of the bishop. (Bishop Bagot, in writing to the Archdeacon about the dispute, employed language which it would be well if the convoked priests would now consider. He says, concerning the speculations in which Dr. Denison had been indulging, "I do not consider it to be my duty to seek in our ecclesiastical courts for an authoritative decision thereon, and thereby narrow the terms of communion in our church." Again he remarks, "I am unwilling in any way to lessen the liberty of thought which she has allowed by seeking to obtain such a formal censure; yet I feel it to be my duty as your Bishop, to condemn the boldness with which you seem to me to have put it forward as being a truth necessary to be held by every faithful member of our church, and to admonish you for the future—if you claim the liberty which in my judgment the church allows you of holding, and of advocating which she discourages, your opinion—to maintain it with moderation and charity, and to abstain from condemning, as ignorant or unfaithful members of the church, those who like myself regret your views.") The opportunity was too good, and the object of attack too attractive, to admit of hostilities ceasing. The edifying exhibition was therefore presented of a malignant war between two ecclesiastics representing two parties in the church, whose theological opinions are obviously more antagonistic to each other than they are respectively to those held by the Essayists and Reviewers. If the Ditcherites are orthodox, the Denisonians are heretics. This is obvious, and on this particular occasion the archdeacon and his friends were adjudged to be the enemies of the church and of theological truth. The archdeacon luckily escaped from the consequences of his crime by a technical point (viz., by showing that the proceedings were taken a few weeks too late), and he has indeed, survived the blow to become an active member of Convocation, and is now a jubilant and vigorous persecutor of the Essayists, being chairman of the committee charged with the duty of devising proceedings against them. He will be able, therefore, to experience the difference which it is said is felt between hunting and being hunted.

There is yet another case now pending, in which the Rev. Dunbar I. Heath, the vicar of Brading, has been brought before the court for preaching heresy in his sermons—the Bishop of Winchester having been instigated to proceed against him by some zealous neighbours of the vicar. The “sound churchmen” are exhibited in rather a foolish position in this case; but they have been now taught the valuable lesson, that vague charges, however common in society, and commendable in Convocation, public meetings, petitions, and addresses, are held in contempt by the law. The prosecutors contented themselves, we understand, in alleging that Mr. Heath had published, in two sermons, certain matter which was contrary to certain Articles; and though they set out the passages in the sermons, they omitted to state what was the doctrine therein contained of which they complained. This would not do, and the Articles were remitted to be amended and rendered specific; and the promoters of the suit will have properly and fairly to show the court that what Mr. Heath has published is “directly contrary and repugnant to the Articles,” which is a very different thing to affirming that it is not agreeable to the clergy inhabiting the Isle of Wight.

(The reader should refer to Hodgson v. Oakeley, 4 Eccl. Ca. 190.—This was a case belonging to the time when certain of the clergy claimed to subscribe in the non-natural sense. Mr. Oakeley had written a letter to the Bishop of London, in which he declared that “the Articles were subscribable in an ultra-Catholic sense, so as to occasion no unnecessary renunciation on the subscriber’s part of any formal decision of the writer’s church, and Mr. Oakeley declared that he did so subscribe them. Proceedings were therefore taken against him by letter of request, calling upon him to answer the charge of having, by his publication, offended against the laws ecclesiastical. Mr. Oakeley did not appeal by counsel, but the promoter did. The Articles against Mr. Oakeley were, said the Judge, “very general;” passages from the pamphlet were set forth, and “the court has to collect the proof of the charge against Mr. Oakeley;” and he added, that if the proceedings were under 13 Elizabeth, there would be great difficulty in calling on him to answer the charge. The proceedings “were under the general law,” and, no defence being set up, Mr. Oakeley had his license revoked, and was inhibited from performing ministerial office.)

We are afraid the sole reason why proceedings are not more frequently taken by and against clergymen for heresies is derived from the undeniably liberal character of the costs in ecclesiastical courts. No greater injury could be inflicted on the church than to cheapen this division of litigation, for the number is large of those who would be glad to vindicate before the world their own soundness by persecuting others, and establishing the heterodoxy of their neighbours. Party spirit is so strong, and sectarian animosity so virulent, that the peace of the church would be destroyed, or its existence imperilled, if greater facilities were given for litigation among ecclesiastics. For the most part, the construction put by the judges upon the disputes of the kind of which we are speaking, is liberal, temperate, and favourable rather to giving latitude to than curtailing the limits of opinion. Take, for example, the judgment in the case of Gorham v. Bishop of Exeter (1 Cripp’s Church and Clergy Cases 260) which was not raised upon the statute of Elizabeth, but occurred by reason of the Bishop refusing to institute Mr. Gorham, because his views on baptism were erroneous; but the judgment in the appeal (which reversed that given below) is important, as containing principles which must be regarded in any litigation which the “Essays and Reviews” may call forth. It was laid down by Lord Langdale, that—1. If the Articles of the Church of England admit in any case of different interpretations, any sense of which the words fairly admit, so long as it be not repugnant to what the church has elsewhere allowed or required, may be allowed. 2. If such Articles are silent or ambiguously expressed upon any particular doctrine, it may be supposed that such doctrine was intended to be left to private judgment; and upon such doctrine all members of the church, having duly subscribed the Articles, and taken Holy Scripture for their guide, are at liberty to exercise their private judgment, without offence or censure.

The possibility, says Lord Langdale, of probable difference of interpretation may have been designedly intended, even by the framers of the Articles themselves; and he urges that in such cases it seems perfectly right to conclude that those who impose the test command no more than the force of the words, employed in their literal and grammatical sense, conveys or implies; and that those “who agree to them are entitled to such latitude or diversity of interpretation as the form admits.” The question in Gorham’s case, decided eleven years since, was upon the efficacy of baptism, upon which views palpably contradictory are held and expressed by churchmen, and about which, moreover, our Articles and Formularies appear to be, without really being, most absolute, dogmatic, and determined. The mere fact, says Lord Langdale, that real opposite opinions “have been propounded and maintained by persons so eminent and so much respected, as well as by very many others, appears to us sufficiently to prove that the liberty which was left by the Articles and Formularies has been actually enjoyed and exercised by the members and ministers of the Church of England.” The Bishop of Exeter had tried to trap the priest by torturing him with one hundred and forty-nine questions in examination, but the latter escaped, and finally tripping up his superior, leaped cheerfully over his mitre into the preferment for which the Bishop protested he was unfit by reason of unsoundness of doctrine.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

Mr. Rayner, the Secretary of the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce, has received from Lord Chelmsford, in reply to Mr. Rayner’s letter inserted ante, p. 512, the following communication:—

“Sir,—You owe me no apology for having “expressed your views boldly” on the subject of my proposed amendments in the Bankruptcy Bill. I am not so wedded to any opinions which I may have formed, as not to be ready to receive thankfully any suggestions which may be made to me by persons of more experience than I can possess; and opinions strongly entertained, ought to be strongly urged, or they are of no avail. The difficulty upon this important subject is, that I have to find my way through the most opposite and conflicting opinions upon almost every point (pressed with great earnestness and force of reasoning) to a conclusion which, to my own judgment, will be the most advantageous to the commercial community. I have no other object in view than to make the Government Bill as thoroughly complete and satisfactory as possible. At the same time, I know that there are conflicting views and interests involved, which it is very hard to reconcile. I may frankly tell you that I am not a convert to the desirableness of transferring bankruptcy business to the county courts, but my views upon the subject are wholly immaterial, as I may tell you without any impropriety, that when the Bill leaves the committee it will be found to contain the clauses 7, 8, and 9 to which you refer.

“The other clauses mentioned in your letter will also remain, but with some modifications (Clause 118), upon which you lay the greatest stress, will be preserved almost in its integrity. The latter part of it, as to the bankruptcy allowance I felt the strongest objection to, and have succeeded in removing it from the Bill. I will not trouble you with my reasons, which I hope would be as satisfactory to others as they have been considered by a majority of the committee. I hope that the meeting which is substituted by the 119th clause of the Bill for the sitting of the court for the choice of assignees will be found to work equally well; that there will be the order and regularity of proceeding which is always desirable, and which can scarcely be anticipated at a first meeting of creditors who are generally at the moment of failure heated and irritated, against the bankrupt, and which is to be presided over by a registrar, who will have no functions to discharge except to be the passive recipient of proof of debts. I trust that in every respect where my views are opposed to the provisions of the Bill they may practically be found to have been erroneous; and I shall be quite indifferent to my judgment being overruled if the effect of it shall be the adoption of a measure which may satisfy the reasonable requirements of the community.—I remain, sir, yours faithfully, “CHELMSFORD.”

THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT CAMBRIDGE.

The Cambridge University Corps having invited the Inns of Court Corps to a brigade field day, the review of these two volunteer corps took place on Saturday, the 18th instant, on "Parkers Piece," Cambridge. The ground chosen was not only well adapted for a review, but also afforded great facilities for allowing spectators every opportunity of witnessing it. The Inns of Court Corps to the number of about 500 mustered in Gray's-inn, early in the morning, and thence marched through the streets to Shoreditch station. The whole were commanded by Colonel Brewster, attended by Captain and Adjutant S. A. Wood. The corps debouched upon the review ground shortly after their arrival at Cambridge, and the six companies composing the corps present were respectively commanded by Captains Lisle, Bulwer, Chitty, Griffiths, King, and Roupell. The Cambridge University Corps came upon the ground in splendid order, six companies strong, but not quite so numerous as the other corps. Three companies were furnished by Trinity, which were under the command of Captains Ashfield, Hoffman, and Burn; one company was supplied by St. John's, under the command of Captain Bushell, and two companies from various colleges, under the command of Captains Sturgis and Willis; Colonel Baker commanding the whole.

Soon after their arrival his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, attended by General Bruce and Major Teesdale, entered the enclosure, when Colonel M'Murdo took the command of both corps, and the evolutions commenced. They were necessarily of a simple character, and consisted entirely of skirmishing, retiring upon their supports, moving at double time, and forming squares. First both the regiments marched past the Prince in open column of companies, and in this apparently simple, though in reality severe test of a regiment's drill, the Inns of Court showed themselves perfect. They would have borne comparison in this respect with some good regiments of the line. After having fought over, rallied upon, and strengthened every corner of the common for nearly two hours, marching in quarter distance open column and skirmishing order, every movement being executed with the quickness and precision of regular troops, the review at last came to a close with a grand charge. Both corps formed a line two deep, extending over a great space of ground, and as the bugle low out its shrill clear notes, advanced, at a quick pace, with fixed bayonets, upon the harmless and unsuspecting British public. Total and immediate was the rout of the spectators before this formidable onslaught, and they rushed from the ground with as much eagerness as if they had in reality been given over to the wrath of an infuriated soldiery. With this bold advance, which was executed with rapidity and good order, the proceedings terminated.

Colonel M'Murdo then called the officers of both corps round him, and in a few words stated that he had been requested by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to express to each regiment the extreme gratification he had felt at witnessing the manœuvres of the day. For himself, the gallant colonel added, that he as their inspector was satisfied with what both corps had effected; but he considered that the captains of companies might, with advantage, learn a little more of the duty which properly belonged to them. The regiments then marched off the ground, followed by crowds, and all the members of the Inns of Court were afterwards most hospitably entertained at the different Colleges. Comparatively few of the London visitors quitted Cambridge on Saturday night, and those who were compelled to return by the special train did so with regret that one of the pleasantest days the corps has yet had was so soon ended. On this occasion, the Inns of Court, for the first time, displayed their beautiful flag, with the arms of the four Inns, which was worked and presented to the corps by Mrs. Selwyn, the wife of the member for Cambridge University. On the whole, notwithstanding the highly flattering notices of this review, which appeared in the morning journals, it was generally felt that the Inns of Court corps had barely sustained its high reputation, which was owing partly to the rush of new members at the last moment, and partly to the fact that there was no opportunity for their going through some of the more unusual and difficult evolutions, in which the corps has acquired remarkable efficiency.

From a return recently presented to Parliament it appears that there are no less than 1,357 magistrates in England and Wales who are in holy orders. A large proportion of them, however, do not act.

••• For Prospectuses, Forms of Proposal, &c., apply at the Offices as above, or to any of the Company's Agents.

To Landowners, the Clergy, Solicitors, Estate Agents, Surveyors, &c.

THE LANDS IMPROVEMENT COMPANY is incorporated by special Act of Parliament for England, Wales, and Scotland. Under the Company's Acts, tenants for life, trustees, mortgagees in possession, incumbents of livings, bodies corporate, certain leasees, and other landowners, are empowered to charge the inheritance with the cost of improvements, whether the money be borrowed from the Company or advanced by the landowner out of his own funds.

The Company advance money, unlimited in amount, for works of land improvement, the loans and incidental expenses being liquidated by a rent-charge for a specified term of years.

No investigation of title is required, and the Company, being of a strictly commercial character, do not interfere with the plans and execution of the works, which are controlled only by the Enclosure Commissioners.

The improvements authorised comprise drainage, irrigation, warping, embanking, enclosing, clearing, reclaiming, planting, erecting, and improving farm-houses, and buildings for farm purposes, farm roads, jetties, steam-engines, water-wheels, tanks, pipes, &c.

Owners in fee may effect improvements on their estates without incurring the expense and personal responsibilities incident to mortgages, and with out regard to the amount of existing incumbrances. Proprietors may apply jointly for the execution of improvements mutually beneficial, such as a common outfall, roads through the district, water-power, &c.

For further information, and for forms of application, apply to the Hon. WILLIAM NAPIER, Managing Director, 2, Old Palace-yard, Westminster.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without the risk of co-partnership.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are given as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,987 10	£6,987 10

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £3,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

G. F. Heneage, Esq. £10 10 0 | Mrs. E. C., add £50 0 0

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds: a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds, to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

Thomas Raymond Barker, Esq., add., £25,	The Rev. A. Chisold £50 0
	Messrs. Cox & Co. 100 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland, as president of the second division of the Inner House, took occasion a few days ago, when considering the recent judgment of the House of Lords in the Marquis of Bute's case, to make some caustic observations upon the decision of their lordships in this case, and upon the reasons of the Lord Chancellor, contained in the opinion which he then expressed to the House. After the judgment of the House of Lords had been pronounced, all that the Scotch Court had to do was to pronounce an order for the carrying out of the directions contained in the judgment of the superior Court. There was no question whatever as to the jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and, of course, the Court of Session—somewhat too jealous, as it undoubtedly is, of its own jurisdiction—could not pretend either to disregard, or to impugn, what the House of Lords had done. The Court of Session, however, complains that the House of Lords, exercising in this case a purely appellate jurisdiction, has pronounced a judgment disposing of the case upon its general merits. But this is no more than what frequently occurs in all courts of appeal where there has been a miscarriage in the Court below, or where such Court has not judicially heard and decided the question, which, in fact, owing to some misconception, it refused to entertain. The Lord Justice Clerk, however, appears to have been very much offended by an observation which dropped from the Lord Chancellor, to the effect that the Court of Session had been influenced by a resentful feeling about the decision in the House of Lords in the well-known case of Johnstone v. Beattie (10 Cl. & F. 42). In that case it was held by the Lords, affirming an order of Lord Chancellor Cottenham, that Scotch testamentary tutors and curators were not testamentary guardians in England, according to the Act of Charles II. (12 Car. 2, c. 24), and that the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to appoint a guardian to an infant, although not only her domicile but all her property were situated in Scotland; and it was further held (but against the opinion both of Lord Brougham and Lord Campbell), that although the Scotch testamentary tutors have the exclusive control over all the infant's property, they had neither authority over nor power to protect the infant in England, nor were they entitled by international law to be confirmed or appointed English guardians. Lord Campbell said in his judgment the other day that "Whatever opinion the Scotch judges may justly form of the decision of the House of Lords in Johnstone v. Beattie, they would have acted with more dignity and more magnanimously, as well as judicially, if they had calmly and promptly considered what was for the benefit of the infant." The Scotch judge in replying upon this, observes, "It is truly lamentable that the Court of Session and the rules and principles which guide and regulate its proceedings, should be so little appreciated or understood in a court of appeal." And then he proceeds to lay down the startling doctrine that Johnstone v. Beattie is not an authority binding in Scotland, inasmuch as it was a decision upon an appeal from an English and not from a Scotch court. "When," says the Lord Justice Clerk, "that case was brought under the notice of the Scotch judges, it was universally felt that however sound an exposition it might furnish of the rules of English chancery law, it involved a violation of the principles of international law recognised in Scotland and all the States of the Continent of Europe, so direct and unequivocal, that I believe that the very last thing that would enter into the mind of a Scotch judge, would be to follow the authority, or adopt the principle, of Johnstone v. Beattie." The question here raised is certainly one of considerable importance, and affords another striking illustration of the disadvantage of the distinct judicatures and systems of law for the two countries of England and Scotland, and of the inconvenience which must always result from the anomaly of there being nevertheless the same Supreme Court of Appeal for both. According to the proposition of the Lord Justice Clerk, even where the House of Lords arrives at a clear and positive decision, establishing certain distinct propositions of law, yet they can be deemed as obligatory only upon that portion of the empire from which the appeal came, although the doctrine laid down is not of a local, but of a general character. According to the Lord Justice Clerk the Scotch judges are at liberty, not only to reject the authority, but also the very principle of the decision of Johnstone v. Beattie, although that principle, according to the judgment of the House of Lords, was founded upon what the House considered to be the rule of international law. Hitherto it has always been considered in this country, in Ireland, and in the colonies, that any decision of the House of Lords was always to be considered as a binding authority upon every interior court throughout the empire, and that in pari materia it was to be accepted as conclusive, although the judgment of the House of Lords might have been given upon appeal brought from a tribunal or even a part of the empire other than that in which the new case arises. At all events, it does appear utterly preposterous for the Court of Session to repudiate the authority of the House of Lords upon a question of international law, which, above all other departments of jurisprudence, is one in which the decisions of the House of Lords ought to be most unhesitatingly accepted. The time, in fact, has long since arrived when the three kingdoms ought to have one system of laws, of courts, and of procedure. There can hardly be a greater absurdity of the kind than the question which underlies the whole of this unseemly contention between the English and Scotch courts, which is simply, whether the infant Marquis of Bute is English or Scotch. Upon this, of course, a very lively and lasting discussion might be raised, but all to no other purpose than to involve the young Marquis and his friends in very needless, troublesome, and protracted litigation, and to prove to the world the absurdity of having such a thing as Scotch as distinct from English domicile, and of having different systems of jurisprudence and sets of tribunals for the two countries. It is certainly full time to put an end to the theory that each is to the other a foreign country, and that the Court of Session is to affect as much ignorance of a decree of the Court of Chancery as if it had been made by the French Court of Cassation. The Foreign Law Ascertainment

Bill, of which we gave an account last week, will do much to facilitate reciprocity between all the courts of the three kingdoms and the tribunals of really foreign countries, but it will do nothing towards abolishing the absurd anomaly of not only distinct but often very conflicting systems of law, and still more conflicting acts, of tribunals in England and Scotland, notwithstanding the two countries are now and have been for a considerable time to nearly every reason and intent of purpose a united and identical whole.

We have not yet heard of any instance in which the new General Order of Chancery relating to the visu voce examination of witnesses before the Court has been acted upon, and it appears not unlikely that it may share the fate of Sir Hugh Cairns' attempt to introduce a British jury within the precincts of Lincoln's-inn, which seems now to be regarded by Chancery practitioners as altogether obsolete. As, however, no cross-examinations can in future take place before the examiners of the court, it will be impossible to avoid in some cases the cross-examination of witnesses before the judge. But where any party desires that the evidence in chief may be taken visu voce at the hearing, the burden is thrown upon him to take out a summons before the judge at chambers, specifying distinctly what particular facts or issues he desires to prove visu voce at the hearing of the cause, the judge having the power to refuse the application; but so long as this practice continues it is not very likely that in many cases parties will be found willing to undergo the risk of a preliminary contest before the judge at chambers, which can hardly fail to involve an untimely general discussion of the whole case, and where, at most, an order can be obtained for leave to give oral evidence as to certain facts or issues, and not generally to prove the plaintiff's or defendant's case. It is therefore very probable that the effect of the recent General Order will be confined for the most part to the cross-examination of witnesses.

It does not appear that any thing has been yet definitively settled about the new examinations under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act of last session. The Incorporated Law Society, three months ago, proposed a detailed scheme which appeared at the time in these columns and was then the subject of a good deal of discussion, and of dissent, on the part of the ten years' clerks. It is said that this scheme has been ever since under the consideration of the chief judges of the common law courts and the Master of the Rolls, with whom it rests, according to the provisions of the Act, to regulate the examinations which it prescribes. We believe, however, that they have not yet arrived at a decision, and article clerks need, therefore, have nothing to fear about a preliminary examination, whether in general knowledge or in law, until the new legal year, which will commence next Michaelmas Term.

The country law societies are following the example of their metropolitan brethren, in presenting petitions to Parliament for the adjustment of the income-tax in favour of precarious and uncertain professional incomes. On Thursday last Mr. Horsfall presented to the House of Commons a petition from the Law Society of Liverpool, similar in terms to that which appeared in these columns a fortnight ago as having emanated from a very large number of the profession resident in London.

A general meeting of the Law Amendment Society was held on Monday the 27th instant, the Right Hon. Lord Brougham in the chair. The subject for discussion was the Amendment of the Patent Laws, upon which Mr. Thomas Webster read a paper, exposing the present lax system of dealing with petitions for letters patent, and the marked incompetency of common juries to deal with the scientific facts and principles necessarily introduced into the trial of patent causes. He insisted that the granting of such letters should be accompanied with conditions strict enough to discourage worthless adventures, but at the same time sufficiently liberal to set others on the track of experiment and thought. At present, except in the few cases of rival claims and suspected fraud, there is no investigation into the merits of a project preliminary to granting a patent. The consequence is that a patent is no guarantee of value, but merely confers the right to maintain an action. Mr. Webster recommended that a board of examiners specially qualified should be appointed to report upon every petition for a patent; but that the adverse decision of the examiners should not have the force of an absolute prohibition. It is supposed that in the face of a strong opinion condemnatory of the undertaking coming from so high an authority, few would venture to proceed with it. At all events many would be deterred from pursuing a chimera, and the public would be protected from sham inventions. Nothing can be more unsatisfactory than the present method of trying patent causes. The question of fact which juries are called upon to decide are mostly hidden in a mass of technicalities, and after eliminating the jurymen who have any pretensions to science, by the process known as knocking the brains out of a jury, those left on the pane are utterly incapable of comprehending the evidence. What is the result? The verdicts go for the plaintiff. Mr. Webster suggested that the tribunal should be constituted on a system analogous to that adopted in the Admiralty Courts, where the elder brethren of the Trinity House are called in to assist the judge. Not only will the statement of witnesses be comprehended and duly weighed, but the character of the evidence itself will be raised. Cross-examinations will be more searching, and men will give their testimony with more care and exactness. Mr. Newton agreed to the changes recommended in this paper. He said that as to patents, litigation was frequently resorted to for the purposes of an advertisement. The plaintiff is safe of his verdict in two cases out of three. Disclaimers should be adjudicated upon by examiners. The greatest uncertainty now prevails on this subject. One law officer will allow anything to be struck out of the specification, but not a word may be inserted; while another will not object if the clause introduced be sufficiently ambiguous. The withdrawal of a specification and the substitution of another should be permitted here as in America.

Mr. Grove, Q.C., advertent to the statute of Monopolies (21 James 1, c. 3), observed that according to English law the granting of patents was purely a matter of royal favour. The public good was to be consulted over the individual interest of the patentee. Every patent should be thoroughly investigated in its inception. But the law officers of the Crown could not do this; they had too much work already. He submitted that there ought to be a separate court for the trial of patent causes alone. The presiding judge should have the power of calling in scientific assessors, and with the assistance of a jury do all the work, not only of the law officers, but also of the Privy Council, in extending the duration of patents.

THE COUNTY COURT PROCEDURE BILL.

Nearly fifteen years have elapsed since the county courts were first established under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. Soon after the passing of that Act, it was proved by experience that the new tribunals might be safely entrusted with a larger jurisdiction than was at first committed to them; and by the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, their ordinary jurisdiction was increased to £50. The legislation of almost each successive year has added some new matter to that with which alone they could originally deal; and now, so multifarious are the matters within their jurisdiction, that the courts at Westminster, having only to adjudicate in causes of the gravest class, are comparatively deserted. Nor has the procedure in these courts been neglected. By the six or seven County Court Acts amending the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and by numerous rules framed under the provisions of those statutes, a method of procedure has been developed which, though necessarily to some extent complicated, has been kept as simple as, perhaps, such machinery can be, to be practically available for the administration of justice. The object to be attained by it has been to provide a ready and inexpensive method for the trial of actions; to enable plaintiffs to bring the nature of their claims clearly before the Court; to prevent defendants from being taken by surprise at the trial by want of notice of the cause of action; and, by giving a power of appeal in matters of sufficient amount or moment to justify the expense of such a proceeding, to correct and restrain within reasonable limits the possible misapprehension of the judge. With a view to saving expense, it has been the policy of the county court legislation to dispense with the formal pleadings of the superior courts; but in order to attain the object for which these courts were constituted, to which we have briefly referred above, some proceedings in writing, whether styled particulars, notices, or pleadings, must be used, and certain forms must be adhered to; and it is impossible to confine within very narrow limits the rules and regulations which a suitor requires, in respect of these matters, for his guidance through the various stages of a suit. It is obvious, from these remarks, that the laws applicable to the county courts, dispersed as they are over so many Acts of Parliament, are now in a state to call for consolidation. It is to the statute itself that both the judge and the suitor must look, if they would wish to be perfectly well informed upon a point in doubt. Books of practice are of great assistance; but they are liable to inaccuracies; and, though an author may have spared no pains in his researches, it is impossible, in making use of a treatise, not to feel that the book may possibly be imperfect, and that some matter bearing on the question in hand may have escaped him. It is therefore especially important with reference to these courts, to which suitors so often resort unaided by the assistance of professional men, that, as far as possible, all matters touching their practice should be embodied in one statute.

A Bill for consolidating and amending the statutes relating to the procedure of these courts is now before Parliament. It has been prepared and introduced by Mr. McMahon and Mr. Serjeant Piggott. The amendments in the law proposed to be effected by this measure, to which we shall presently advert, would add much to the efficiency of the system, and in some respects may claim the approval of the public; but we regret that these gentlemen, instead of extending their labours to the consolidation and amendment of the whole of the county court law, have introduced an incomplete and partial measure. It would have been better either to have introduced a general consolidation Bill or to have limited the operation of this to those alterations in the law which it proposes to effect; and we have reason to know that several county court judges, who are most competent to form an opinion, consider that the interests of the public would have been better consulted if one of these courses had been pursued. The Bill necessarily proposes to repeal wholly or in part numerous sections of former statutes, nearly the whole of which, with slight alterations, are re-enacted in the Bill; but the condition to which the body of the county court laws would be reduced by the amputation of so many important members seems to us so precarious and liable to lead to inconveniences of construction, both with reference to the county court statutes and other Acts of Parliament referring to them, that upon that ground only, if upon no other, we think the Bill open to objection. Whatever may have been the amount of caution exercised by the framers to prevent those inconveniences from occurring, we cannot think that so much matter can be removed from the previous Acts without causing confusion, without interference with the context and prejudice to the now settled interpretation of those and other Acts. If, however, the framers of the Bill would take the trouble of excising those parts which are merely re-enactments of former statutes, and would introduce the amendments as they stand as an independent amending Bill, there can be little doubt that the measure would be favoured; and the system having been thus rendered complete, the task of consolidating the whole would present no difficulty. Another reason for not passing the Bill in its present form is, that in dealing with fraud summonses, and powers of committal, it would affirm the law in this respect as it now stands. But the policy of permitting the law with regard to imprisonment to remain unchanged, is open to grave question; and, as a constitutional question, demands more serious consideration than it has hitherto received. The alterations which the Bill proposes to effect are, by enabling the courts to deal with equitable defences (sect. 37), by enabling defendants to interplead (sect. 27), by providing that by consent a special case may be stated for the opinion of a superior court (sect. 30), by enabling the judge to reserve leave to either party to move in a superior court to enter a verdict or nonsuit, so as to get rid of the delay and expense of an appeal, when the question is simply one of law (sect. 48), and, finally, by extending various clauses of the County Court Statutes to the London Sheriff's Court (sects. 135—137). All these changes deserve approval. The Legislature has not hitherto seen fit to entrust the judges of the superior courts with that jurisdiction by which alone complete justice can be administered in cases where equitable questions arise; but the instalment of equitable jurisdiction which has been conferred upon them by the Common Law Procedure Acts, has been found by experience to work well; and there is the stronger reason for vesting similar powers in the judges of county courts, since, having regard to the amount claimed in ordinary suits in those courts, if such defences are disallowed, a defendant, practically speaking, having no means of restraining the action, must necessarily submit to injustice. The advantages of enabling a defendant to interplead are too obvious to call for comment. It is very requisite also that the judge should be enabled to state a case for a superior court. It is a power now enjoyed by stipendiary and other magistrates, by chairmen of quarter sessions, and by judges ad nisi prius. It not unfrequently happens in county courts that, although the claim in a suit is of small amount, important interests are involved in the determination of the rule in point of law; and, where he entertains a doubt, it is more for the benefit of the suitor that the question should be raised by a case for the Court, than that he should be driven to the complicated and expensive process of appeal. The tendency of the Bill, so far as it relates to the Sheriff's Court of London, is to render that Court, under the title of the County Court of London, an integral part of the county court system. That Court, regulated as it is by a local statute, and at the same time claiming peculiar privileges as an ancient Court of Record, is at present an anomaly. Practically, however, its jurisdiction and procedure are those of the county courts. It appears to have been the intention of the framers of the Bill, by rendering the procedure of the Sheriff's Court identical with that of the county courts, to assimilate the courts still further, and, without interfering with the ancient jurisdiction of the former, to place it in other respects upon the same footing as the metropolitan county courts. We think that the amendments would add much to the efficiency of the county court system. We recommend them to the favourable consideration of legal members; and hope that the authors of the Bill, to whom the country is indebted for suggesting them, will use every effort to carry them through the House.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. III.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

III. We have thus considered* all those cases in which the jurisdiction of the Courts of Criminal and of Common Law has been exercised, to punish the fraudulent imitation of a trade mark; that they are few, in comparison with those which we shall have to examine, shows sufficiently that hitherto the protection afforded by the Court of Equity to a trader, in respect of his property in, or his right to use, a distinguishing mark or name, has been considered more effectual than those methods which I have already discussed.

I have referred to the case of Millington v Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, in illustration of the proposition that only where the legal title is clear will a Court of Equity interfere by injunction to restrain the use of a trade mark.

When that title is not clear, there are two courses open,—either to grant the injunction, at the same time ordering the plaintiff to bring an action at law to prove his title; or to suspend the injunction, and to order an account to be kept by the defendant of the profits which he may have made by the use of the mark or name alleged to be pirated, leaving it to the plaintiff to try his legal right or not, as he may consider advisable. The balance of authority is perhaps in favour of the latter course, and the reasons for which it is preferable are very fully stated by Lord Cottenham in Spottiswoode v. Clarke, 2 Ph. 154, in the following words:—“I have often stated it to be my opinion, that unless a case of this kind, depending upon a legal right, is very clear, it is the duty of the Court to take care that the right be ascertained before it exercises its jurisdiction by injunction, and that it may commit great injustice by interfering until that question has been decided.” His Lordship then points out the objections to this immediate interference in questions of disputed title; first of all on the ground that in pursuing this course the Court compels future litigation, whereas by suspending the injunction it enables the plaintiff to pause and consider whether it is worth his while to begin that course of litigation which will be requisite to establish the right on which he insists; in the second place, that in granting the injunction the Court is expressing a strong opinion upon the legal question, and thus prejudicing the defendant's case.

The strongest objection, however, certainly is, that the Court runs the risk of doing the greatest injustice in case its opinion upon the legal right should turn out to be erroneous. If the plaintiff proves his title by a successful action at law, he is indemnified by the defendant, on the account which the Court has directed the latter to keep. On the other hand, if the plaintiff fails in his proof at law, there is no means of compensating the defendant for the loss he has sustained by the suspension of his trade during the operation of the injunction. This is, no doubt, quite a sufficient reason for withholding that remedy, unless there be a very clear preponderance of proof in favour of the plaintiff in the first instance, or some conduct be shown on the part of the defendant which renders it unadvisable to permit him to continue his trade upon the footing of an account to be taken. Similar principles have been applied in the exercise by the Court of its jurisdiction in patent and copyright cases, and on the same grounds, and in Stevens v. Keat- ing, 2 Ph. 333, the same learned judge uses these terms, “that if the injunction having been once granted turns out to be unfounded, you are doing an irreparable injury to the parties restrained, whereas by withholding it you may be permitting some injustice, but certainly not an injustice at all equal to that which you are doing by improperly granting it.” In the latter case the Court went so far as to fix the time within which the plaintiff was to bring his action; and on his failing to proceed to trial of that action upon grounds which were by the Court considered to be insufficient to justify his delay, and upon a subsequent motion on the part of the defendant, the injunction which had been granted on the merits of the case was dissolved, and the defendant was directed to keep an account of his profits.

We come then to consider what are some of the circumstances which have been held to give a good legal title to the use of a trade mark, and when, on the other hand, the Court has considered it necessary to have that preliminary question decided by a trial at law. Long continued usage of a particular mark or stamp has been held to be a valid ground of title (Mottley v. Downman, 3 My. & Cr. 1; Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84; Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338). In Knott v. Morgan, 2 Kee. 213, the adoption and use by certain omnibus proprietors of particular names and figures painted on their vehicles was held to give them a title to those names and marks sufficient to support an application for an injunction to restrain the defendant from running his omnibuses under marks colourably imitated from those of the plaintiffs. We find that the use of a name or mark may be transmitted from one person to another by devise, by succession, or by agreement inter vivos, so as to give an undisputed title in the holder. On the other hand, in Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 421, it was considered that the question of title to use the name of a partnership firm, as between the personal representatives of a deceased partner and the surviving partner was a proper question to refer to the decision of a court of law. In Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66, it was contended that the plaintiff had, by inventing and using without interruption for six years, a name which he had applied to his “Balm” for the hair, acquired a title to that name, which the Court would protect by perpetual injunction. There, however, the course which Lord Cottenham, as I have before stated, considered to be the more advisable, was followed, and on the plaintiff's failing to bring his action at law, his motion for the injunction was dismissed. In Rodgers v. Nowill, 6 Hare 325, the question of title was raised on the part of the defendants by a statement that a firm under the title of J. Rodgers and Sons (which was the style adopted by the plaintiffs), had carried on business for some years in Sheffield; that the plaintiffs had no exclusive right to use that name or stamp, which the defendants as partners of, or successors to, the firm were entitled to use. One point of some importance was raised in this case, as to whether the plaintiffs were entitled to any decree, inasmuch as they had not established their legal title at the hearing. It is no doubt an act of indulgence to a plaintiff to give him, by retaining his bill, an opportunity of proving his title at law, when he has neglected to bring forward at the hearing any evidence of title which would support a decree; and in Bacon v. Jones, 4 My. & Cr. 433, the bill was dismissed on this account. It is said (in Rodgers v. Nowill) that in cases between traders affecting the conduct and profits of their business, the omission on the part of a plaintiff to establish his legal right either before the bill is filed, or if not, to establish it by the leave of the Court before the hearing of the cause, is a circumstance always unfavourable to a claim for indulgence at the hearing. That it is a great hardship on a tradesman to call him to account for what he has been doing for three or four years during the progress of a suit, and a hardship which is unnecessary and of no advantage to the plaintiff; and it seems that generally the Court will in such cases dismiss the bill of a plaintiff who at the hearing fails to bring forward sufficient evidence of his title.

The foregoing are some of the more important cases showing the grounds on which the Court acts in restraining the violation of a trade mark where the legal right is clear, "where there has been such a length of exclusive usage of the name or mark of the plaintiff as to justify the Court in interfering" (London and Provincial Life Assurance Society v. London and Provincial Joint-Stock Life Insurance Company, 11 Jur. 938) it will do so in a summary way against the defendant. On the other hand, when the question of right is not so clear and indisputable, it will order the plaintiff, while it gives a temporary protection to his title, to maintain his right by a trial at law, or will give him an opportunity by the same means of asserting that right, if on further reflection he should find it worth his while to do so. We shall have in the next place to consider who are the persons entitled to appeal to the Court for its protection in one or other of these forms, and to notice the distinctions which exist between the rights of British subjects and those of aliens on this head.

SEARCH FOR INCUMBRANCES: JUDGMENTS IN PALATINE COURTS.

(COMMUNICATED.)

Some weeks ago several correspondents, qualified by experience, furnished you with observations called forth by Lord St. Leonards' latest Act relating to judgments—23 & 24 Vict. c. 38—from which the undeniable conclusion resulted that this branch of the law was left in a most difficult and incongruous state.

I now trouble you with a few remarks on a phase, which was not presented to your readers, regarding its operation in the Counties Palatine.

1. I presume that the last statute (if we except ss. 3 & 4, the object of which is to extend to "heirs and executors" the protection given, in regard to registration by previous Acts to purchasers and mortgagees) does not modify or affect to alter the effect of judgments registered or unregistered as such, under former Acts, which effect is laboured to be shown in the communications of your learned correspondents.

2. The statute merely superadds a further condition to the practical efficacy of future judgments by prescribing the issue of execution also prior to the conveyance, and the registration of such execution, and its being put in force within three calendar months. It is to be noted that the statute pursues a negative expression, privative of the effect of judgments otherwise rightly constituted, but not conforming with the new enactment (scilicet, as to execution), but does not enact affirmatively that a judgment complying with the former requirements and with that Act is to have a particular or certain effect, unless the preamble can be strained to that import. I need not dilate on the consequence of this, in the state in which it leaves judgments antecedent to the Act, which are expressly excluded from its operation.

3. At the end of s. 2 are words transferring the new enactment to executions on future judgments of the Courts of Common Pleas of Lancaster and of Darham (alike without predicating the obligation of such judgments), under which words the prothonotary and proper officers have opened registers of executions on judgments of those palatine courts respectively.

4. I would now apply this state of enactments in considering the searches which caution prescribes for judgments and incumbrances that may affect lands purchased in a county palatine; broadly, as to judgments signed before the passing of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38 (23rd July, 1860), the future registration of which (observe) is not precluded and which for many years must remain of moment to any title; and more narrowly in their effect on leasehold lands there situate.

5. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, declared a judgment (registered as required, s. 17) to be a charge upon all lands of whatsoever tenure as against purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors. By s. 21 of the same Act a corresponding register is established of judgments of the palatine courts.

6. Then came the 2 Vict. c. 11, s. 5, which enacted that as against purchasers and mortgagees without notice, no judgment, although duly registered, should bind further than it did before the 1 & 2 Vict. This enactment is by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 3, extended to judgments of the palatine courts.

7. The 2 Vict. c. 11 applied to judgments of the superior courts, which would then affect lands in the county palatine, if registered there; but the statute did not apply to judgments of the palatine courts until the passing of the 18 & 19 Vict., which required all judgments to be registered in the palatine court.

8. I need not remark that before the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, on a judgment, one moiety only of freehold lands could be seized under an elegit, which it might be, although the purchaser had had no notice, and although the defendant in judgment had parted with the property; and that leasehold lands were not bound at all prior to the delivery of the writ to the sheriff.

9. After the passing therefore of the statute 2 Vict. c. 11, say from 1840, it was expedient, as to freehold lands in Lancashire, to search the register in the common pleas at Westminster for judgments in the superior courts which then bound lands in Lancashire, on account of the old liability of one half of the land, and to search the like register of judgments of the common pleas at Lancaster entered in that court. As to leaseholds, neither was necessary; and the only way to guard against the possibility of executions was to search the sheriff's office, when he would allow it, or to examine the imparlance book for the issue of process.

10. In this state of things the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, passed, which declared that no judgment of any court shall bind lands situate in the county palatine unless registered in the palatine court. This Act is still in force, and necessarily gave rise to the practice of registering at Preston a judgment obtained in one of the superior courts; but it was not converso necessary to register in London a judgment of the common pleas at Lancaster, on account of sect. 21 before mentioned of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

11. It would seem, therefore, since the 18 & 19 Vict. to have been sufficient as to all judgments affecting lands in Lancashire to search the register kept at Preston.

12. I have remarked that as to old judgments (before July 23, 1860) the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, makes no alteration; for these, which will long continue (by re-registration) to be material, the same registers must still be searched. For judgments of later date it might have seemed that by this statute the search was transferred from the register of judgments to the new register of executions, but for the circumstance that the reference in the latter being required to be in the plaintiff's name, and not in the defendant's, makes it necessary to obtain from the judgment register a clue to the name of such plaintiff. To dispense with an execution so found it must be proved that three calendar months have elapsed, and that it has not been proceeded on.

13. But applying this to the county palatine, will an execution, duly registered in London on a judgment of a superior court registered in London, but not registered in the judgment register of the county palatine pursuant to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 2, have any effect on lands situate in that county? It would seem not, since the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, has not repealed that Act, nor has it by affirmative words, in establishing a register of executions, given to judgments, which are the root of them, a greater force than they before possessed under the modifications in the 2 Vict. c. 11, and the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15. If this be a correct deduction it is still not necessary as to lands so situate to search for the judgment, as the parent stock, in any other register than the judgment register in the county palatine; since, on the theory, a judgment of any court not there registered has no force on such lands; and it must be presumed that there is no virtue in the execution, independently of the judgment its root. A modern judgment is further ineffectual unless the writ of execution be also registered under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, and be promptly proceeded on.

14. Arrived at this point, what is incumbent on the purchaser of leasehold lands? Since the 2 Vict. c. 11, restoring the old law, if he have no notice, he is not (malgré the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, which only uses negative words, vid. pl. 2) bound until the writ is in the hand of the sheriff, and to its efficacy are superadded the other conditions, that the judgment (by inference from the second section of that Act) has been registered in such way as the law required (semble, in the county palatine also when the lands are there situate, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 2), and that the execution, if in a superior court, has been registered with the senior master of the common pleas at Westminster, or if in the palatine court, with the prothonotary, and that it is enforced within three months from that registry.

15. As to leaseholds, if a purchaser without notice could simply search the sheriff's office for the writ, he would be safe; but as this will not often be allowed, he is to discover the probability of an execution having issued by following the vendor's name (under the present lame index) to the register of judgments; and as it is argued that no judgment whatever not registered in the county palatine can affect lands in that county, this local register of judgments becomes, as of freehold lands, so of leasehold, the sole and ultimate source of information in inquiries as to such property.

16. As to leaseholds in general, and as to freeholds in respect to judgments entered since the 23 & 24 Vict. it might be deemed unnecessary to search for incumbrances incurred by former proprietors who ceased to be such at a period more remote than three calendar months, except upon the supposition of a case where the execution has been re-registered, and the writ lying previously in the sheriff's hands had for some good reason not been put in force. The power of re-registering the writ of execution seems to be a matter not concluded by the late statute.

COURT OF PROBATE AND DIVORCE.

May 24.—Dr. Phillimore, Q.C., said it would be a great convenience to the gentlemen practising in this court if his lordship would make it a rule not to take a new case after two o'clock on Saturdays. He believed that such a rule would be in accordance with the practice in the other courts.

His LORDSHIP said he thought it was a very reasonable request. He could not promise to rise at two o'clock on Saturdays, as that might involve inconvenience to the suitors; but he had no objection to say that he would not begin a new case after two o'clock.

Dr. Phillimore, on behalf of the bar, thanked his Lordship for granting their request.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he was instructed by the Select Committee on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill to lay that Bill on the table, with the amendments which had been made upon it. In order not to occasion premature discussion, he would remain silent at present in regard to the amendments which had been made by the committee. Indeed, he thought some of them might be better called alterations than amendments, and they were such important alterations as would require the serious consideration of their lordships. He would move that the Bill, with the alterations, should be reprinted, so that their lordships would be able to see in what respect it differed from the original. Ample time would be given for the consideration of the Bill in its altered form. Of course it would be necessary for the Bill to pass through a committee of the whole house, and he hoped that in the end it would be made generally acceptable. He would now content himself with moving that the Bill be reprinted and fixing Monday week for its consideration in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

LORD BROUGHAM laid on the table a Bill, precisely similar to that of last year, for assimilating, in so far as the liberty of counsel to speak is concerned, the procedure in criminal cases to that which prevails in civil cases.

The Bill was read a first time.

EXPIRING LAWS.

On the motion of Mr. PEEL, the following members were appointed a committee to inquire what temporary laws of a public and general nature are now in force, and what laws of the like nature have expired since the last report on the subject; and also what laws of the like nature are about to expire at particular periods, or in consequence of any contingent public events:—Mr. Peel, Mr. Massey, Sir S. Northcote, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Cowper, Sir W. Jelliffe, Mr. Baring, Mr. Williams, Mr. Brand, Lord J. Manners, and Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen. Power to send for persons, papers, and records.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

On the motion of Mr. COWPER, the following members were named as the committee on the Courts of Justice Building Bill:—Mr. Cowper, Lord J. Manners, Sir J. Shelley, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Mellor; and four members to be added by the Committee of Selection.

COMMON LAW.

CLERK, NATURE OF HIRING—NOTICE OF DISMISSAL.

Davis v. Marshall, Exch., 9 W. R. 520.

It has been long established that a clerk or other person serving in an office of business, though employed in some sense intra mania, does not fall within the rule which governs the hiring and dismissal of a domestic servant—viz., that where there is no express stipulation as to the time that the service is to last, it may be determined by either party at pleasure by giving a month's warning, or, in lieu thereof, a month's wages. The general rule, on the other hand, as to the engagement of a clerk is, that it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence the other way, to be a yearly hiring; and, as such, determinable only at the end of the current year, after (it is apprehended) reasonable notice. Beeston v. Culyer (4 Bing. 309) is a leading case upon this subject. In that case it was held without any hesitation, by all the judges of the Common Pleas, that the above distinction between menial servants and persons who, like clerks, must be presumed to have superior acquirements, was a sound one. The only question on which they felt any doubt was, as to any and what notice was required prior to the termination of the engagement at the end of any particular year. They said that the general principle of such a hiring was the same as that which governed the hiring of a house—viz., that the contract was for a year at first, and then, if nothing to the contrary was said on either side, went on from one year to another; but they declined to say whether all the incidents of a yearly tenancy were to be grafted on the engagement of the clerk; and, in particular, whether a half-year's notice, concluding with the day on which the hiring commenced, or even whether any notice at all, was required. It is to be observed that in some text books it is intimated that the question whether the hiring in any particular case be a yearly one, depends on whether the salary be payable by the year or otherwise (see Step. Com. 4th ed. p. 240); but this proposition is incorrect according to the present case, in which the Court said that the payment of the salary of a clerk monthly or quarterly did not affect the question of the yearly hiring, as periodical payments were necessary to this class of persons.

LAW OF EXECUTION—EFFECT OF TAKING DEBTOR IN EXECUTION—ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS.

Hartley v. Shemwell, Q. B., 9 W. R. 520.

This case should be read in connection with a decision of the Court of Exchequer, of which an account was given a few weeks ago.* It is somewhat difficult to reconcile the views which the respective Courts appear to hold as to the effect of taking a debtor in execution. At the same time, it is to be observed that the present case is not precisely on "all fours" with the previous one, though it gives some reason to suspect a discordance of opinion between the two Courts. It will be recollected that in Jorralde v. Parker, it was held upon demurrer to be a good plea by a garnishee that he had been already taken in execution by the original judgment debtor for the debt attached; and this was so considered by reason, chiefly, of the principle laid down in Burnaby's Case (1 Str. 658), to the effect that to take the body of a debtor in execution satisfies the debt in point of law. In the present case the same point arose at a different stage of the proceedings and in a different shape. No action had been brought against the garnishee, and, therefore, there was not the opportunity to raise the question of law by way of demurrer; but an order to attach a debt due to the original judgment debtor had been made by a judge, which order it was sought to have rescinded on the ground that for the debt so attached the garnishee was, at the time of the order, in custody under a ca. sa. on a judgment obtained against him by the original judgment debtor. This rule was refused, Mr. Justice Crompton saying, "A judgment debt is not extinguished by the imprisonment of the debtor under a ca. sa., although the judgment creditor cannot touch the property of the debtor." No reference seems to have been made to Jorralde v. Parker or to Burnaby's Case; and though the proposition stated by the Queen's Bench as to the operation of a ca. sa. seems to be borne out by the authorities,—yet the judgment of the Exchequer, being upon a demurrer to a plea, is perhaps entitled to the greater weight, as having been given with more solemnity and deliberation.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

COMMON PLEAS, PHILADELPHIA.

Colladay v. Baird.

This case, which was decided by the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia, but mainly upon English authorities, will be interesting to readers who are concerned with the law of trade marks. The case decides that:—

A person who has appropriated to himself a particular label, sign, or trade mark, indicating that a certain article is made or sold by him or his authority, and with which label or trade mark the article has become identified, is entitled to the protection of a Court of Equity, which will restrain any one who attempts to pirate the good will of his friends or customers by using such label, sign or trade mark without his authority; but there must be, between the genuine and fictitious marks, such general similarity or resemblance of form, colour, symbols, designs, and such identity of words and their arrangement, as to have a direct tendency of misleading buyers who exercise the usual amount of prudence and caution; and there must also be such a distinctive individuality in the mark employed by the counterfeiter as to procure for him the benefit of the deception resulting from the general resemblance between the genuine and the counterfeit labels or trade marks.

Upon a motion for an injunction,

LUDLOW, J.—The complainant, in his bill, alleges that he is the manufacturer of a certain style of goods known in the market as "Aramingo Check;" that, at great labour, care, and expense, he has been able to produce a superior article, which he now manufactures and sells in large quantities, especially in the city of New York; that in the year 1854, he devised and adopted a certain trade mark, or name, to wit, the words "Aramingo Mills," and that he caused tickets, or labels, bearing the said trade mark, to be lithographed and printed. These labels, or tickets, the complainant used, by placing one of them outside of each piece of goods forwarded to market for sale; and thus the trade mark became identified with the goods manufactured by the complainant, although his name does not appear upon the label as manufacturer. The complainant further alleges, that the defendant, intending to deprive him of the exclusive use and benefit of his trade mark, cunningly devised a label upon which the words "Aramingo Mills" appear; and thus, by a colourable artifice succeeded in defrauding him of a portion of his well-earned reputation and profit, having introduced an article of check, into the New York market, and sold the same, in appearance similar, but in fact inferior, to the article manufactured by him, the complainant.

The defendant declares that true it is that the goods so manufactured are so made at a place called the "Aramingo Mills," but that these mills have long been known by that name, and that the complainant has no exclusive right to the use of the name as a trade mark; that the defendant also manufactures his goods at the same establishment, being in fact the lessor of the complainant; he further denies that he ever, in any way, intended or did introduce his goods into the market by a fraudulent device; and that, although upon the label now used by him the words "Aramingo Mills" appear, yet that he has a perfect right to use them, especially as he intends to succeed in business by his own name and fame as a manufacturer, and has, therefore, among other things, inserted his name in full upon the label.

This brief statement of the bill filed, and the affidavits presented, will enable us clearly to understand the true principle involved in this case, and while we have been unable to discover, in print, any adjudged case of authority in Pennsylvania, yet the subject is not new, and has repeatedly received the attentive consideration of justice both in this country and in England. The principle has been firmly established that while a manufacturer has no copyright in a label, he yet may adopt a trade mark, which so far becomes his own property as to entitle him to the protection of courts of law and of equity.

In Patridge v. Menk, 2 Sandf. Ch. 622, the principle is stated, and we think, accurately, thus, "The court proceeds upon the ground that a complainant has a valuable interest in the good will of his trade or business, and having appropriated to himself a particular label, sign, or trade mark, indicating that the article is made or sold by him or by his authority, or that he carries on business at a particular place, he is entitled to protection against one who attempts to pirate upon the goodwill of his friends or customers, or the patrons of his trade or business, by using such label, sign, or trade mark, without his consent or authority."

The leading English cases at law and in equity upon this subject, will be found collected in a note to Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sandf. Ch. p. 599. Also Clement v. Maddick, 16 Leg. Intg. p. 236. While in Taylor v. Carpenter, decided by Judge Story, and said to be badly reported, in Law Reg. 437; in Coats v. Holbrook, Taylor v. Carpenter, (a New York case,) Patridge v. Menk, 2 Sandf. Ch. p. 586 to 628, as also in Coffeen v. Branton, 4 McLean, 516, Howard v. Henriques, 3 Sandf. s. c. 725, when the name of a hotel was treated as trade mark, Davis v. Kendall, 11 Am. L. Reg. 680. Dayton v. Wilkes, 16 Leg. Int. 292. Coats v. Piatt, 19 Leg. Int. 213, will be found the leading American views upon this subject, down to a recent period of time, and which fully sustain the principle which we have heretofore stated.

While the general principle is thus established a difficulty frequently arises in determining the particular circumstance of each case; or as in this instance in determining how far one may use a name adopted by another, as a trade mark, and yet not conflict with his legal or equitable rights.

It may be remarked in general, that while an imitation or fac-simile or a mere colourable artifice will bring the offending party clearly within the rule, no decision has ever yet declared the right of a manufacturer to be absolute in a name as a name merely; it is only when that name is printed in a particular manner upon a particular label, and thus becomes identified with a particular style of goods, or when a name is used by a defendant in connection with his place of business (and not his manufactured goods), under such circumstances as to deceive the public, and rob another of his individuality, and thus destroy his fame and injure his profits, [see Howard v. Henriques, 3 Sandf. 725, a case which will be hereafter commented upon], that it becomes a trade mark, or in the nature of a trade mark, and as such entitles its possessor or proprietor to the protection of courts of justice. Hence the true rule to test the question of a piratical use of a name is not simply to discover that a name has been used in a particular manner by a defendant, but to determine how far the use of it in the manner said to be piratical, has either in fact deceived the public or is calculated to deceive persons of ordinary intelligence.

In Croft v. Day, 7 Beavan 88, the Master of the Rolls lays down the following rules:

1st. There must be such a general resemblance of forms, words, symbols, and accompaniments as to mislead the public.

2nd. A sufficient distinctive individuality must be presented so as to procure for the person himself the benefit of that deception which general resemblance is calculated to produce. The Vice-Chancellor in Patridge v. Menk, 2 Sandf. Ch. 624, applies the following tests:

1st. The Court will not interfere when ordinary attention will enable purchasers to discriminate.

2nd. It must appear that the ordinary mass of purchasers, paying that attention which such persons usually do in buying the article in question, would probably be deceived.

These principles run through all the cases, so that while one, who ignorantly or by design uses an imitation or fac-simile of the trade mark of another, is within the rule, so also is that defendant who employs a colourable artifice, not strictly speaking a fac-simile or imitation. And to this last point, see Coffeen v. Brunton, 4 McLean, above cited. Let us now apply these principles and tests to the case in hand.

The label of complainant is printed upon paper of a pinkish hue, bearing at the top thereof in large capitals, and in a semi-circular form the words:

ARAMINGO MILLS.

Immediately beneath these words is a circular vignette, supported upon each side by two oval vignettes; below, in large capitals, are the words "CHECKS" and "WARRANTED," and then in small capitals, "INDIGO BLUE."

The label of defendant is printed upon paper of a "buff" tint, with a fanciful and deep pink boarder, within which is an oval space and on which the following words are printed and arranged thus:

SUPERIOR DOMESTIC POWER LOOM GOODS, Manufactured by WILLIAM BAIRD,
At Aramingo Mills,
FRANKFORD, PA.
Warranted Fast Colors.

The words "AT ARAMINGO MILLS," are printed in small capitals.

The most casual observer will at once discover that these two labels differ in many important particulars.

The label of complainant is nearly one-third larger than that of defendant, the colour of the ink used is different, as well as the size of the letters, the one has three distinct vignettes, the other none whatever; the words upon each of the labels, except the two "Aramingo Mills" are different; the most ignorant person must at once, at a glance, detect these differences so far as they relate to the general appearance of the labels—even the objectionable words themselves present marked features which cannot escape the observation of any one. In the complainant's label they strike the eye at once, because they are printed, we before said, in large capitals, at the top of the label, and in black ink, while in the defendant's they are introduced near the end in small capitals, of a pinkish tint, and although distinct, present no striking peculiarities.

The label of the defendant cannot be said to be in any sense an imitation or fac-simile of that of complainant; nor can it be said to be even a colourable imitation, device or artifice. If, then, we sustain the present motion, we are driven to the position that the mere use of the words "Aramingo Mills" upon the label of defendant, renders him liable for the piratical appropriation of a trade mark.

That the legal effect of such a position would be doubtful, appears, we think, by an application of the principles and tests heretofore referred to in this opinion.

If, from abundant caution, we were disposed to adopt a most liberal doctrine—one radical in its practical operation—and grant this motion, a particular reference to a few of the adjudged cases, presenting facts most strongly in favour of the complainant's views, will convince us that the decision would be one of doubtful propriety.

In Patridge v. Menk, the name "A. Golsh" was the valuable portion of the label, because the friction matches made by him had acquired an extensive reputation with the trade as "Golsh's Matches," and although it appeared that the defendant had printed, certainly upon one of the labels used by him, the same name but in connection with the words late chemist for, in small capitals; yet the Vice-Chancellor dissolved the injunction upon the ground that a purchaser seeking for the Golsh match, would at once, upon reading the label, discover the difference between the maker of that and any other article. The Chancellor upon appeal affirmed this decision.

So in Spottiswood v. Clarke, an English case, reported in Sand. Ch. 638, the Lord Chancellor dissolved an injunction which the Vice-Chancellor had granted, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action at law, where the plaintiff in the case was the owner of a publication called "The Pictorial Almanac," and the defendant of one called "Old Moore's Family Pictorial Almanac," although the covers of each book were to a certain extent similar, both being decorated with a pictorial representation of the Observatory at Greenwich, and in the title as printed on the cover, making use of nearly the same expressions.

The two strongest cases which can be cited in favour of the complainant are Coffeen v. Brunton, 4 McLean 516, and Howard v. Henriques, 3 Sandf. 725. In each of these the principles applicable to the subject under consideration were carried much further than in any other of the adjudged cases. In the first, the plaintiff insisted upon his right to the use of the name "Chinese Liniment," and that his right had been interfered with by one who printed the words "Ohio Liniment" upon his label. Judge McLean granted the injunction, but upon the ground that "from the body of the label and of the directions for the use of the medicine, it is clear that the language of the defendant so assimilated to that of the plaintiff as to appear to be the same medicine." The alterations being only colourable. This case is clearly distinguishable from the present; here the differences between the two labels as to the words "Aramingo Mills" are such as to guard the purchaser.

In Howard v. Henriques, the Court went one step further, and declared that the proprietor of an hotel, called the "Irving House" or "Irving Hotel," had—although the name did not appear upon the building—such a right to it as to secure the protection of the Court against one who endeavoured to use it in connection with and upon his place of business.

This case, strong as it is, can, we think, easily be distinguished from the present. The "Irving House" or "Hotel" became identified with a particular building; here the goods are identified, not with the "mills"—that is the building—but with the label bearing the words "Aramingo Mills." They are known in the market by the label, and the label alone. Besides, while the principles established before the decision in Howard v. Henriques may have been correctly extended to meet that case, yet, in weighing its authority it ought not to be forgotten that the circumstances attending it were peculiar, for the name in dispute was that of an hotel, and although not displayed upon any particular part of the building, was, as a matter of fact, as well known as "the City Hall" or "the Trinity Church," and the assumption of the name under the circumstances as a palpable fraud, and so considered by the Court.

In the Omnibus Case Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keene R. 213, the device was clearly colourable, for, in addition to the fact that the omnibuses bore the same external decorations, the carriages were named "The London Conveyance Company," and "The London Conveyancer Company," an artifice well calculated to deceive a transient traveller.

In conclusion, having endeavoured to show that this case does not fall within the principles applied to cases involving the use of a trade mark by means of an imitation fac-simile, or colourable artifice, and which relate to personal property, to manufactured articles, and to such things as are necessarily moveable. We might refuse this motion, because the complainant puts his case upon the ground that he has been injured by the piratical use of his label; willing, however, to go further, and grant the relief sought, if the facts established required it, we have examined the law upon the question of the use of a name merely, and for the purpose of illustrating the principles, we have cited at length the leading cases upon the subject. The result of this examination has been to lead the mind to a serious doubt. This doubt has been strengthened from a knowledge of the fact, that the defendant manufactures his goods at the "Arumingo Mills," or in an establishment occupied by the complainant, and which, for some years, has been known by that name.

Without, therefore, deciding the question, (which is also a matter of doubt,) as to the real intention of the defendant in using the objectionable words upon his label in the present state of the law, we are not prepared to say absolutely that the use of the name printed as it in fact is upon defendant's label is a violation of the law. We must therefore adopt the judicious course pointed out in Patridge v. Menk, and Spottiswood v. Clarke, and leave the complainant to maintain his right by an action at law. We refuse to grant this motion.

THE JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The following paper "On Promotion at the English Bar—its Effect on the Barrister, the Crown, and the Suitor," was read by EDWARD WEBSTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, at a meeting of the Juridical Society, on the evening of the 27th May, 1861. W. T. S. Daniel, Esq., Q.C., in the chair.

Some persons may suppose a member of the Bar to be, from personal interest, incapable of giving the subject of the present lecture, a calm and unbiassed consideration; and, as he has freely adopted his profession, that he cannot honourably object to any of the customs affecting it. Hence it may be alleged, that the Bar should leave their fellow citizens not of the legal profession to question, if there be any cause for questioning, the expediency of certain selected members of the Bar having conferred upon them at the will of the Crown, and without any public services, a grade of honour and exclusive forensic privileges. So far from being incapable, a barrister is of all persons the best qualified to arrive at an impartial judgment, upon the expediency of abandoning, retaining, or amending, any of the customs affecting his profession, and if there be reasonable grounds for apprehending, either that they are not the best that can be devised, or that they are in their operation injurious, he has a right to canvass them, and to have them fully and publicly considered, especially by a Society professing to be juridical. It may, however, be, and is readily, admitted, that the interests of the Bar are inseparable from those of the State, and therefore, however open to objection the principle may be, if there be any principle at all, on which promotion at the Bar is made, yet, if it be that best adapted for the Crown and the suitor, the Bar should be silent. It is then on public grounds that I venture to bring the present subject to the notice of this Society.

In the reign of Henry VIII., those four associations called the Inns of Court appear to have been formed by persons voluntarily united for the common purpose of becoming proficient in the highest branches of the law.

They appear to have consisted of members divided into four grades, of which the apprentices or inner "baristers" or barristers, (Waterhouse, Comm. 544, Or. Jur. 158), now called the students, were the lowest. The next in rank were the "utter baristers," or barristers, which expression denoted a degree for legal learning given by the inns of court to which the apprentice belonged, but which degree conferred no right to undertake the duties of a barrister-at-law (Or Jur. 311, 5 vol. Foss—Manning's Serjeant, 180; 5 Reeve's His. 247). The next in rank were juriconsults, called counsel or counsellors, or barristers-at-law, and the remaining members were the benchers, who were the governing body of the inn, and who were, from time to time, selected from amongst those counsel of the inn who were of not less than twelve years' standing, men of learning, practice, and good and honest conversation, (Dugdale's Or Jur. 144, 316), or at the Inner Temple from utter barristers, (id. 162). The probationary course of study required from a member of the inn, before he became entitled to undertake the duties of a counsel, were in the reign of Henry VIII. as follows; namely, after he had obtained the degree of utter barrister, a further period of legal study for ten years was required from him, which period was in the reign of Elizabeth reduced to five, (Foss, vol. 5, 424) at the end of which time he was entitled to plead in any court at Westminster, and to subscribe any action, bill, or plea, (Or Jur. 312). Possibly the term "barrister-at-law" was used to denote the advance from the degree of utter barrister to that of counsel.

The benchers from amongst themselves also chose readers of two kinds, one called a single, the other a double reader, a reader becoming a double reader by officiating as reader a second time, after an interval of nine or ten years. The office of reader comprised the duties of tutor, judge of the mootings, (which were contentious arguments on some legal question by members of the inn below the rank of counsel,) and lecturer, and the educational department of the inn was chiefly under his supervision and guidance. The office of reader was therefore one of much importance, and from the double readers the Crown selected its law officers, including the royal or Crown serjeants (Or Jur. 144.)

Serjeants' Inn had always stood alone in its customs. It was as regards the Bar, the stronghold of the Crown, being composed of barristers selected and compellable (Wynne's Tracts, 336,) by the Crown, to take upon themselves the state or degree of serjeant-at-law; without which state or degree no barrister could become a judge of any of the three Common Law Courts at Westminster. The serjeant-at-law bound himself to serve the King and his people, and also undertook not to take any fees for any matters, where the Crown was a party, against the Crown; and if called upon he was bound to counsel the Crown. (Manning's Serjeant, 191.) His liberty of appearing as counsel for one of the people against the Crown, was therefore so much restricted, that the serjeant-at-law was virtually retained by the Crown; and, doubtless, in consideration of this and for the purpose of keeping up the influence of the Crown in the inns of court; the serjeants in the Court of Common Pleas when at Westminster (4 Inst. 72) had a monopoly as against the whole of the other members of the Bar, except the law officers of the Crown, who when engaged for the Crown and not otherwise had a right of pre-audience over the serjeants. (3 Bulstrode, 32.)

In all the other courts, for anything appearing to the contrary, the Bar of England was up to the year 1668 one body; each member having a right of pre-audience, and a seat in court according to his rank or seniority. So jealous were the inns of court of any interference in their affairs by those nominees of the Crown, the serjeants-at-law that upon a barrister becoming a serjeant at law, he was obliged formally, and with much ceremony, to take leave of his inn. The law officers of the Crown then consisted of the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, the Royal Serjeants, the Attorney of the Court of Wards and Liveries, the Attorney-General of the County Palatine, and the Attorney-General of the then Court of Augmentations. (2 Campbell L. C. 292; Or Jur. 144.)

Francis Bacon, afterwards Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, in the year 1580, became a member of Gray's inn, and in the year 1583 he appeared in the dress of an utter barrister, (1 Birch's Memoirs, p. 33). It is reasonable, therefore, to presume that he had then obtained that degree, although Lord Campbell states that he was not called to the Bar until 1586, (2 Campbell, L. C., p. 24), which, considering the then existing rules of the inns of court, may be true. Having become the reader, and having been invited to the bench of his inn, he in 1586 applied to his uncle the Lord Treasurer to be called "within the bars," (16 vol. Mont. Bacon, p. 23), an expression somewhat singular and of doubtful meaning. It probably meant that he might be permitted to practise at the bar before his time came, according to the rules of Gray's inn. Be that as it may, he in 1586, took his seat within or at the bar, as an ordinary counsel, in whose favour, owing to his marvellous learning and ability, and his extraordinary interest with those in power, the rules of his inn were departed from. In the year 1590, he was sworn "Counsel Extraordinary" to the Queen without fee or reward, and soon after the accession of James I., he was constituted by letters patent the king's counsel learned in the law, with a salary of £40 a-year, having been previously knighted. Sir Francis Bacon was, therefore, the first barrister specially appointed by patent to act as counsel to the Crown.

According to a very learned serjeant, (Woolrych, Jour. L. A. S. 1857-8, p. 106) who is contradicted by the late Sir William Follett, (Manning's Serjeant, 25) between the appointment of Sir Francis Bacon in 1590, and that of Mr. North in 1668, presently mentioned, other king's counsel were appointed, but it does not appear that their appointment, or that of Bacon, interferred in any way with the government of the inns of court. At what period in particular a space in the courts at Westminster was appropriated to the exclusive use of certain selected members of the bar, nowhere, it is believed, authentically appears; but at or very soon after The Restoration there was such a space.

From what has been stated, it will appear that the inns of court were voluntary associations for educational purposes; that those associations enacted a long, severe, and improving course of legal study before any member could take upon himself the high and responsible office of a juriconsult or counsellor, that they had trained officers to superintend the legal education of the members; and that from those officers the Crown selected its law officers, and that each inn was governed by an independent self-elected body chosen from barristers-at-law, members of the inn of not less than twelve years' standing. A more efficient system for providing a continued supply of independent, honourable, and learned lawyers could not be devised.

Mr. North, a barrister-at-law, having unsuccessfully, but most ably, appeared as counsel for the Crown on an appeal to the House of Lords in the year 1668, (3 St. Trials, 333), the Duke of York induced the King to mention to Lord Keeper Bridgeman his wish that he should take his place within the bar. The wish was complied with, and Mr. North accordingly became by patent king's counsel, and took his place within the bar, and although the benchers had always previously on a vacancy occurring, elected one of their own body to the bench, Mr. North boldly claimed to be made a bencher. The benchers resisted this attempted infraction of their ancient laws; but Mr. North had for his allies the sovereign and the judges, the latter of whom, to please the Crown, arbitrarily stopped the current of public justice; for they refused to hear the benchers as counsel in the courts at Westminster until Mr. North's claim should be granted. (Life of L. K. Guildford, vol. 1, p. 67, 68). Unfortunately for the Bar, and to their own great disgrace, the benchers yielded to this outrage on themselves and the suitors; and thus the Crown for the first time violently obtained a voice in the government of the inns of court, and thereby virtually destroyed that free and independent constitution they had for nearly three centuries possessed.

The effect of this unlawful act as regards at least one of the inns of court, namely, Lincoln's-inn, has for a long time been, and still is, to suspend indefinitely the exercise of its ancient right to elect members of the bar of twelve years' standing to the office of bencher, that inn now calling to the benchers' table only those members of the bar to whom rank has been given by the Crown. That inn is, therefore, practically no longer governed by members of the Bar, as such, but by an unlimited number (now upwards of sixty) of nominees of the Crown. Of this The Bar has a just right to complain, as they are by this modern custom virtually deprived of their ancient right to become by selection of The Bench governing members of their inn. Formerly, a barrister was called to the bench very sparingly, (Dug. Or Jur. 316); but now a crowd of governors is practically forced upon the inns of court, not necessarily selected from that class of barristers who were formerly alone eligible for the office. According to a very learned writer, the usurpation by the Crown in Mr. North's case contributed to a cessation of all educational discipline in the inns of court. (Macqueen, Early History of the Inns of Court, p. 22.) He did more, thenceforward the education for the bar gradually degenerated into a form— which any member capable of reading the three first words of a written and much worn exercise could comply with. How could it be otherwise since the law officers of the Crown were no longer taken from the readers of the inns of court? Under this arbitrary principle of selection, the bar of England has since been, and is still, divided into two sections, called the inner bar and the outer bar, the inner bar having a right of preaudience over the outer bar, and having also higher rank. From this and from no other cause it attracts to it, what is termed, leading business. The barrister on becoming a member of the inner bar ceases to prepare the pleadings in causes— those written instruments of litigation which astonish by their length the unlearned beholder. The business of the inner barrister in court becomes oral. He plans the line of argument to be followed by his coadjutor of the outer bar, and replies to the arguments of the opposing counsel. If and when necessary, he comes to the aid of his junior at the outer bar; and all the most important proceedings in court are committed to him. Hence the outer bar is subservient to the inner bar, and has ancillary duties to perform towards it.

Now, if it could be truly alleged that there is necessarily more forensic learning—more forensic ability—secured to the public by this division, than there would be if the bar were one and entire, then the present system should remain unchanged; but we venture to state as a fact, not open even to argument, that this is not the case, and that there would be the same amount of learning and ability were the bar one entire body; and that even in its present divided state there is, and must be, the same amount of learning and ability at each bar, because the requirements from each are the same, except where, on forensic grounds only, an outer barrister of very rare and exceptional learning and talent has been called to within the inner bar, and has thereby caused a disparity; but the responsibility of each of the two bars, if at all unequal, is greater at the outer than at the inner bar; for it is chiefly on the advice of the outer barrister that litigation originates, and the responsibility of advising litigation is greater than that of conducting it after it has begun.

Those members of the inner bar whose superiority places them at the head of it, would, under a system of free competition enabling every barrister to take leading business, be in a higher position than they are at present, since they would have the whole bar to contend with instead of the limited number of competitors forming the inner bar.

It is not then owing to a division of the bar into two grades that it is so distinguished for learning and talent, neither is it owing to that division that these distinguished men are at the head of it.

The present system of promotion frequently operates so as to cause unavoidable damage as regards a barrister's professional income, since not to advance at the bar is to retrograde, and although it may be alleged that this would be true were there no division, yet there is this great distinction, viz., that whereas, if the bar were one body, the barrister would alone be responsible for any diminution of his employment; under the present system of two bars he is not so, because he may be, and oftentimes is, prevented handling the instrument necessary for his advance, whilst it is put into the hands of his rivals it may be not a whit better entitled to it than himself. The barrister, however, has no right to complain if the system be the best for the State; indeed, he cannot, without covering himself with ridicule, complain, in so far as his position is occasioned solely by himself. He enters the profession in common with other men. The same instruments are within his power, and the start in the professional race is fair and open to every competitor. Some have, indeed, when starting the aid of a friendly solicitor, and doubtless, the absence of this support has, it may not be unfrequently, made the profession hopeless. Such instances of failure are, however, we believe though not very rare, exceptional. Moreover, early in his career the young barrister, if he should perceive his prospects at the bar likely to disappoint him, may betake himself to some other calling; but in the more advanced stage of his profession, when the rank and privileges of the inner bar become under the present system necessary to secure an increasing and to prevent a decreasing professional income, if the barrister be denied this advancement from some unknown cause, it may be an entirely mistaken estimate of his powers, his condition is such that unless the system causing this unmerited injury compensates the State by producing some great public good, it ought not to be allowed to continue. For the evil just referred to, a simple remedy and one apparently very just and one moreover consistent with the maintenance of the inner and outer bars may be suggested. It is this, that after twenty years' standing a barrister should be entitled to take his seat within the inner bar, wearing a bar dress denoting that though not a Queen's Counsel, yet that his vocation is that of a leading counsel; but this remedy is imperfect, if it be expedient to throw down the wall of partition between the two bars.

It is well known to the legal profession that Queen's Counsel have practically no duties whatever responding to their title. That for the most part they have never to advise or act for the Crown. That they are ordinarily never called upon to act as one of the council mentioned in their letters patent, nor yet in any barristerial or forensic capacity. "Queen's Barristers unattached" would therefore be their proper appellation; for as regards their learning and ability, they are the same men they were after receiving their letters patent, and they undertake no responsibilities by virtue of their appointments beyond the negative duty of not appearing in court against the Crown unless licensed so to do. It is not, then, in consideration of employment by the Crown, that outer barristers desire this advance. They have in view other advantages, and those advantages are professional and private. The chief professional advantage is the right to participate in the lucrative business of the inner bar; for though a suitor may, if he pleases, have his suit conducted by any one, or any two or more counsel, without reference to their being either within or without the bar, yet in all important matters a member of the inner bar is in fact, nay, if the suitor be not betrayed, must be employed, either alone or with an outer barrister. Hence a monopoly of the most enriching business is enjoyed by the inner bar, namely, the briefs given to the leading counsel, which briefs are called leading briefs, being duplicate copies of the briefs given to the outer barrister, but having in anticipation of the coming service far higher fees marked upon them.

So far as the barrister is concerned, therefore, the right to practise within the inner bar confers very considerable professional advantages, provided he possesses the learning and talent necessary to enable him to avail himself of them; but instances not unfrequently occur, at least beyond the common law courts, of barristers when within the inner bar, having little or no employment, although they in their former sphere had a very considerable business. So many examples proving this have existed, that confidence in the mode of selection must be greatly shaken. Whether the advancement answers, is therefore contingent upon the counsel having the talent for that leading and oral business which, under the present system, belongs exclusively to the inner bar, and it is impossible to predicate whether the outer barrister is or is not adapted for it; and hence a barrister of the outer bar may even with a small amount of business at the outer bar, be nevertheless well qualified for the inner bar. At a certain stage of his profession it is frequently necessary under the present system for the barrister to apply for rank. If he obtains it, and fails, he is generally a sufferer both in fortune and professional reputation. If he applies, and does not obtain it, he is from that time in a state of professional decadence; if he obtains it, and is successful, he has to receive many well deserved rewards; but if the bar were one, if it were free, if there were no division, no artificial monopoly, whilst the successful barrister would continue to be rewarded, neither of the two disappointments referred to could possibly occur. An unsuccessful member of the inner bar has, however, private advantages of some value to modify his discontent. He is introduced by custom to The Sovereign by the Lord Chancellor; a privilege of some domestic value, and he becomes though not of right, yet by custom, a bench of his inn of court, and has all the personal advantages arising from that position; and were the grade he possesses really a test of forensic merit, he might be justly considered in general society, as wearing a well merited ribbon of professional honour, given to him by the highest law officer of the Crown.

When the Lord Chancellor had his own Court, and the Rolls, and the three Courts at Westminster only to superintend, and when the number of Queen's counsel was practically limited to ten or a dozen, it was perhaps possible that he might have such personal knowledge of the forensic ability of every candidate for the rank of the inner bar, as to be able to decide justly, on forensic grounds, whether he ought or ought not to have it; but now that there are twelve courts in the metropolis in which barristers practise, and the number of Queen's counsel when created under the present system may exceed a dozen at a time, and is practically unlimited, it is impossible that the Lord Chancellor can have such knowledge, and therefore he must, before giving rank at the bar, resort to extraneous information—a circumstance which necessarily, in the exercise of patronage, generates great evils. If a large business at the outer bar were the only test, less injustice would arise; but such a test would to a great extent transfer this patronage of the Crown, to that of the large firms of solicitors, and moreover would be fallible, since the quantity of business at the outer bar is no test, or a very imperfect test, of the barrister's capacity to conduct business belonging to a leading counsel.

Time seems to be no criterion by which the rank is conferred. It may vary from twelve years, or less than twelve years' standing, to a standing at the bar of nearly three times twelve. Hence, the drudgery of the outer bar has to be endured for the periods the most unequal and uncertain. On such a principle, it is impossible that rank can be awarded, for the individual members of the bar do not differ in talent and learning in the proportion these periods bear to each other. If they did, the bar could not maintain its high status. What, moreover, is the effect, as between the barrister of twelve and the barrister of thirty-two years' standing, both being advanced together? That the former obtains a gift of the opportunity of twenty years leading professional business, of which the latter has been deprived. In truth, there is no principle or rule by which promotion conferring exclusive forensic privileges can be made, which on investigation does not prove to be unsatisfactory, which in its operation is not either erroneous, or unjust, or corrupt, or arbitrary. The advancement to the inner bar has, it would seem, apparently been given as a "donceur"—on the abolition of Doctor's Commons—it has been conferred, apparently, as the reward for political fidelity;—it has, apparently, been conceded to the owners of great wealth on account of their wealth; even the sentiments of certain religious bodies, not belonging to the State Church, appear to have been regarded as a material element when granting it. In fine, it is an honour given apparently, or in fact, not infrequently on grounds extra-forensic, save that the recipient must have been called to the bar by his Inn of Court under customs in name educational, but in truth requiring no compulsory legal education whatever. What is the result? That the number of Queen's counsel is far beyond the exigencies of the Crown—the title has been termed, but not by your lecturer, a mock dignity (14 Law R., 314); and, be it here remarked, the Crown should not disparage itself by creating mock dignities. But, how does it affect the bar? Disappointment—as frequently to the successful as the unsuccessful candidate—errors in selection—and unintentional but grievous practical injustice. So far then as the barrister is concerned, the present system of promotion at the bar confers upon him no advantages whatever, nay it places him oftentimes at a disadvantage by surrounding him against his will, and from no cause for which he is responsible, with circumstances inimical to his progress, and in which in a free country no man depending on his labour ought to be placed. It now remains to consider how the present system affects the Crown and the suitor. It appears to us that to justify its continuance one at least of the three following propositions must be established.

1st. That in order to train counsel for the office of judge, it is necessary that besides the law officers of the Crown there should be a department or section of the bar with exclusive forensic privileges.

2nd. That in order to maintain our monarchical constitution, it is necessary that the Crown should have the power of conferring rank and exclusive forensic privileges on such members of the bar as the Crown may from time to time select for the purpose.

3rd. That it is an advantage to the suitor that there should be, besides the law officers of the Crown, a section of the bar with exclusive forensic privileges.

Even if it be true that members of the inner bar are better adapted for judicial duties than men of the same standing at the outer bar, yet this arises from the latter, under the present system, being deprived of the opportunity of going through the same training. Moreover, there are examples of very eminent judges being advanced to the judicial office direct from the outer bar. It seems indeed almost too obvious for remark, that the hearing of suits in open court, conducted by and in the presence of a learned bar, and skilful solicitors, must, whether there be one, two or more grades at the bar, afford a supply of learned and well qualified lawyers for the office of judge, and if an example were wanted in order to prove the unsoundness of the first proposition, the Scotch judges may be referred to. On what principle then does the Crown interfere and destroy, or at least prevent, that free, legitimate, and honourable competition which would otherwise exist at the bar? Is it to maintain the influence of the Crown? If so, it should be confined simply to a title of honour, without any exclusive forensic privileges—for if the rank be coupled with a position—which causes a monopoly, whereby the suitor is damaged, and the barrister is benefited at his expense—it is difficult to distinguish the principle adopted towards the bar by the Crown from that on which a successful election too frequently occurs. Money, indeed, is not given, but rank and exclusive privileges, and personal advantages are.

If it be alleged that the loyalty of the bar is secured by there being two grades, one with and one without the royal favour, the answer is that such an allegation is a libel; for it may be truly affirmed that the loyalty of the bar to the Sovereign would be as sound and as ardent as it is now, were the bar not divided into two ranks. Why is this system of promotion not applied to other professions? There is no long array of physicians in silk gowns, with the senseless appendage of Q. P. added to their names—It may be argued that the Crown ought to have the power in order to enable it to bring forward young and talented men early in their professional career; but to justify that, it must be proved that such men would remain in obscurity, and unemployed under a system of free competition. It may, I think, then be considered as proved that to the extent to which the monopoly of the inner bar interferes with free and honourable competition, it is alike injurious to the barrister and the Crown, and it appears to us that no damage to the Crown could arise from the bar being entirely free, since it must select from the bar its ordinary law officers, and its advocates, and also its judges, and this necessity would alone secure that legitimate influence which the Crown ought to have over all large and influential public bodies.

If, however, this were not considered sufficient, the Crown might have power to confer on a barrister of very distinguished learning and ability an order of honour under the name of "The Crown's order of learning," or some other name with a garb to distinguish the recipient when in court, but without giving him any exclusive privileges, and which the Lord Chancellor would for his own credit never grant except it were merited, since the honour would be useless in court unless supported by corresponding ability.

And now as regards the suitor, it may I think be taken as an axiom that in proportion to the difficulty and necessity of obtaining an article of exchangeable value, the price of the article increases, and that the services of counsel are articles of exchangeable value, and necessary to the suitor.

If this be so, and the present system of promotion at the bar limits the area within which those services are produced, to that extent it artificially increases their value.

When John Stuart Mill wrote the following passage he certainly was in error. The passage is, so far as it applies to the present subject, as follows:—

"All professional remuneration is regulated by custom. The fees of (inter alia) barristers are nearly invariable. Not certainly for want of abundant competition, but because the competition operates by diminishing each competitor's chance of fees (vol. 1, 290) not by lowering the fees themselves."

Now, the principle on which fees are given to counsel is uncertain in its operation; they are by no means invariable in amount, being frequently, nay, I think generally different. The fees, for example, for the plaintiff and defendant are often marked very differently on precisely the same papers, varying also very much with the pecuniary condition of each suitor, and it is a fact which cannot be disputed that the exchangeable value of the forensic talent of each counsel varies subject to this exception, viz, whilst the fees marked on briefs given to members of the outer bar approximate to each other, being calculated by the brief sheet or folio, the fees given to members of the inner bar vary in the most extraordinary manner, high talent and position, especially if duly appreciated and insisted upon by a clever clerk, commanding fees oftentimes double what would be marked for an ordinary member of the bar. Hence far larger fees are given to some counsel than to others. Indeed, certain counsel will not render their services in some of the courts without a fee of a certain amount.

In the Court of Chancery the necessity for giving there high fees operates most grievously, since it frequently happens that there are many parties to a suit, each of them employing at this large cost, a member of the inner bar.

As to the fact, that fees vary in a great degree and are subject to no certain principle, I have received, very thankfully, information from three gentlemen, eminently qualified to give a correct statement on the subject. (viz. Mr. Skirrow, of the firm of Gregory & Co. Bedford-row; Mr. Follett, the taxing-master; Mr. White, senior, of Great Marlborough-street.)

In a former page Mr. Mill had stated, in substance, that the natural effect of unimpeded competition is that there cannot be two prices in the same market (p. 288,) and in a subsequent page (p. 291) he observes. "Where competition though free to exist, does not exist, or where it exists but has its natural consequences overruled by any other agency, the conclusion before referred to will fail more or less of being applicable."

To say that no competition at the bar exists would be untrue, but that its natural consequences are overruled by the present system of promotion cannot, I think, be denied. In short, the law of custom, to the extent to which the forensic talent at the outer bar is displaced, or remains unemployed by the exclusive employment of the inner bar, overrules the natural law of competition. Capital employed causes the production of wealth, and capital saved and again employed causes its reproduction in an augmented ratio. With the increase of wealth, the necessity for legal professional assistance also increases, and hence an increased demand for the services of the Bar. Now, if the demand for forensic services remained stationary, and the number of barristers increased, competition would undoubtedly operate by diminishing each competitor's chance of fees, because the same amount of money and business would have to be distributed amongst an increasing number of competitors; but if the demand for forensic services increases with the wealth of the country, then the chances of each competitor either remain the same or are increased or diminished according to the laws of supply and demand.

Forensic talent.—I mean successful forensic talent—is a quality which depends in part upon nature, in part upon cultivation, and until cultivated its qualities remain unknown. To the extent to which the law of custom overrules that of competition the development of this talent is impeded. It may be alleged with perfect truth, that under the present system of monopoly, a large amount of fruitful talent at the bar, especially amongst young barristers, is always unknown and undiscovered, and hence the suitor has not the advantage of it.

It is then proved that the remuneration of barristers under a free system of competition, would depend upon their personal qualifications, and that the suitor would have a larger selection than he has at present; hence, according to the laws of political economy, if the suitor had six men of equal ability from which to select his advocate instead of three, the exchangeable value of forensic services would be one half of what it otherwise would be. It is thus proved that if there were no monopoly at the bar, the suitor would be largely benefited. Moreover, under the present system, whenever the Crown and the subject litigate against each other, the suitor is debarred from employing any of the counsel, who have received their patents as Queen's counsel. True it is, that a licence to appear against the Crown is never refused to the Crown's counsel, but is there any just reason why the Crown should have this monopoly at all? Is there any State necessity for it? Is it reasonable that the suitor and the Crown should not have equal power to avail themselves of the most competent advocates?

It has been observed that, with very rare exceptions, the learning and ability at each bar must always be equal—the responsibility the same; or, if at all unequal, that there is more responsibility at the outer bar. If this be so, can any injustice be greater than that in consequence of an arbitrary division of the bar into two unequal ranks, the higher in rank should receive in exchange for the same amount of skill, labour, learning, and anxiety, a reward at least one-third—and frequently far more than one-third—higher than his fellow-labourers? Whenever this occurs, the outer bar and the suitor have a common and unanswerable cause of complaint against the present system of promotion at the bar.

Let it, then, be supposed that the Crown did not exercise this barren prerogative, and, consequently, that the Crown and the suitor were, as regards all barristers not being law officers of the Crown, on an equality. The whole bar would then be entitled to take leading business, and it would be optional for a barrister, whatever his standing might be, to act as leader or as junior, or to unite those capacities, in conducting causes in court.

Is it not certain that under such a system the public would have a far larger amount of learning and talent at command than they have at present? In short, that law of political economy, applicable to all artificial productions depending for their value on skilled human labour, would apply to the bar—viz, that competition keeps down prices, and produces at the same time the best article. The talent of each barrister would furnish him in the early part of his career with the kind of business for which it was best adapted. In many cases it would be entirely unnecessary for more than one counsel to appear for a suitor. The career of each barrister would be—as it ought to be—dependent upon his own merit, and the bar would be in a more independent, and therefore a more honourable, position than it now is.

The Crown would not only be as well protected, but would be free from all imputation of favouritism, and the suitor would find law expenses materially reduced, and would, nevertheless, have his cause more efficiently advocated.

It will be observed that the object of this article is chiefly to advocate a freer system of competition at the bar. That question is not entirely unaffected by example or precedent. At the Scotch bar there is, as has been already intimated, free competition; there are no Queen's counsel, no inner bar. That the Scotch system works well seems certain; for there has been no attempt, or no successful attempt, to change it since its establishment some centuries ago. Even in England, a question analogous in principle to that now before the society has been raised, and determined in favour of freer competition. That question arose under the following circumstance. So far back as the year 1755, Lord Chief Justice Willes proposed to the other judges, that the Court of Common Pleas should be opened to the whole bar. They were, however, against the plan; but in April, 1834, the Crown, by Royal mandate under the sign manual, ordered that the exclusive right of the serjeants-at-law of practising, pleading, and audience in that court, should, on the first day of Trinity Term then next ensuing, cease. In January, 1839, a petition to the Crown was presented by certain serjeants-at-law, praying that the legality and expediency of the mandate should be duly investigated, and the petition was referred to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, and was soon afterwards heard. In 1840, the Court of Common Pleas declined to give effect to the mandate (Manning's "Serjeant-at-Law," p. 329), and ultimately the Legislature passed an Act in 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 54) whereby the Court of Common Pleas was thrown open to the whole bar. Experience has proved that this step was in the right direction, the Crown, the suitor, and the bar having all received great advantages from the discontinuance of the serjeants' monopoly; and hence arises a strong presumption that analogous benefits would ensue from a still further extension of the principle of competition.

If the bar had always been one and entire, many barristers of the inner bar, who are now comparatively impoverished, would be in the receipt of their former professional income; and if the Crown were to have power to confer the title of honour I have suggested, the emulation of the bar amongst themselves would in no respect flag, since a title so obtained would be often the precursor to a judicial appointment. I think, moreover, that in accord with the ancient customs of the inns of court every young barrister who has obtained honour from the inns of court should be entitled to wear in court a bar-dress, denoting what he has already achieved.

Whether the ideas now promulgated will receive support, time will show. If they are not founded in justice and reason, they will rapidly fade into oblivion; but if they be founded in justice and reason, they will, notwithstanding the opposition they are certain for the present to excite, gradually operate on public opinion, and especially that of the bar, and by increasing in volume and in strength, will ultimately remove the boundary between the two bars, and will restore to the inns of court their ancient independence and self-government. Whatever the result may be, this is an endeavour to reinstate the bar in its ancient liberties and its ancient independence, and to free the suitor and the bar from a pernicious forensic monopoly, and to prevent the possibility of the Crown, as the fountain of honour, being sullied by favouritism when conferring rank at the bar.

It may then, I think, be considered as proved—

First,—That an inner bar is not necessary to train advocates for the office of judge.

Secondly,—That there is no sound principle on which exclusive forensic privileges can be granted.

Thirdly,—That it is unnecessary for State purposes that the Crown should have the power of granting such privileges.

Fourthly,—That the existence of the two bars restricts the suitor in his choice of counsel, and thereby largely and unnecessarily increases the expenses of litigation.

In conclusion, I will remark that the subject is one in which every member of the bar, and especially every young barrister, has a very material interest. The pursuit of truth has induced me to prepare and read this lecture, which expresses the deliberate conviction arising from the experience and observation of many years, and which would, if it had not been read before this learned society, have been in some other manner brought to the notice of the legal profession, under any circumstances not rendering the publication of it impossible.

If it should directly or indirectly attract the attention of the public to the manner in which law expenses are largely and unnecessarily increased, and of the bar to its own best interests, my labour will not be vain. Gentlemen, I thank you for your patient attention. I have now finished.

LIGHTMOOR TO COALBROOKDALE.

LYNN AND HUNSTANTON.

THE METROPOLITAN RIFLE RANGE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Capital, £60,000, in 12,000 shares of £5 each. Honorary Directors:—His Grace the Duke of Wellington; Earl Grosvenor, M.P.; Viscount Ranelagh; Major-General Lord

Frederick Paulet, C.B.; Lord Radstock; Lient-Colonel the Hon. C. H. Lindsay; Major-General Hon. Sir J. Yorke Scarlett, K.C.B., Adjutant-General; Lient-General Sir F. Love, K.C.B., K.H.; Sir Duncan McDougall; Lient-Colonel Bathurst; Lient-Colonel Hicks. Directors: William Dent, Esq., Tokenhouse yard; Thomas Hughes, Esq., Old-square, Lincoln's-inn; Andrew Johnston, jun., Esq., 83, Upper Thames-street; R. W. Kennard, Esq., M.P., Upper Thames-street; Frederick Mildred, Esq., Nicholas-lane; Henry Vavasseur, Esq., Summer-street, Southwark (with power to add to their number.) Solicitor: J. Bell, Esq., 21, Abchurch-lane. The object of this company is to construct a permanent practice ground in the neighbourhood of London, easily accessible to every part of the metropolis, with an ample supply of butts at the various ranges, up to 1,000 yards, sufficient to accommodate all the metropolitan rifle corps. A piece of land has been secured at Kensal-Green, upwards of 1,100 yards in length, which will admit of butts of an aggregate breadth of more than 1,500 feet. Forty-six targets will be erected in the first instance; they will be so arranged as to allow the whole of them to be used with perfect safety at all the different ranges, at the same time the long-range butt being 70 feet high. The firing stations will be partially covered, so that the practice may go on without interruption in unfavourable weather. The electric self-registering target, adopted by Government, will be used, by which the point struck by each shot is instantaneously recorded at the firing station. The price of the land is expected to be about £30,000, but a competent surveyor will be engaged by the company to value it. As this land, owing to its proximity to London, must yearly increase in value, it will always form a valuable asset in the company's hands. The vendor has offered to take £5,000, in paid-up shares, and to let £10,000 remain on mortgage at £4 per cent. In addition to the armouries, &c., it is proposed to erect a large covered hall for drill, &c. The terms of subscription for the use of the range, suggested for the first year, and to be continued, subject to such future alterations as the company may deem desirable, are as follows:—For a corps of 1 company, 25 guineas per annum; 2 companies, 50; 3 or 4, 75; 5 or 6, 100; 7 or 8, 125; a battalion of more than 8, 150; for a corps of more than 1 battalion, 125 guineas per battalion; individual subscription for volunteers, 1; non-volunteers, 2. The use of the large drill hall, if erected, will be allowed to corps requiring it on terms to be arranged by special contract in each case. It is further proposed that every volunteer, being an original subscriber for not less than ten shares, shall, until he transfers his shares, be entitled to a life admission to the range, and this privilege will follow the transfer. All profits beyond 8 per cent. will be set aside as a reserve fund, which will be appropriated by the honorary and ordinary directors jointly, subject to the approval of a general meeting of shareholders, to the furtherance of the volunteer movement. The Duke of Cambridge and Lord Herbert have seen the plans, and highly approve them. Major-General Hay has inspected and approved the ground. For further particulars, prospectuses, and forms of applications for shares, apply to the secretary, J. H. P. Bland, Esq., at the company's temporary offices, No. 21, Abchurch-lane, E.C.; or to the company's brokers, Messrs. Sandeman and Dobree, 2, Royal Exchange-buildings.

BAR EXAMINATION.

At a public examination of the students of the Inns of Court, held at Lincoln's-inn Hall, on the 15th, 16th, and 17th days of May, 1861, the council of legal education awarded to Hugh H. O. R. Macdermott, Esq., a studentship of fifty guineas per annum, to continue for a period of three years; Emanuel Maguire Underdown, Esq., John Houston, Esq., Charles Carleton Massey, Esq., certificates of honour of the first class; Charles Owen, Esq., John Bamfield Street, Esq., James Watson, Esq., Joseph Inglesant, Esq., Reginald Carew Glanville, Esq., Robert Dalby Dalby, Esq., John Alfred Hudson, Esq., the Hon. Evelyn Melbourne Ashley, Christ. John Cottingham, Esq., Chas. Bertie Pulleine Bosanquet, Esq., certificates that they have satisfactorily passed a public examination.

MESSAGERS OF THE BANKRUPTCY COURT.—A return has been issued showing the income of the "messengers" of the Bankruptcy Court, who have been described by the Attorney-General as performing slight duties, which might be executed by very subordinate officers. Four of the "messengers" of the court in London state their "net receipts" last year at above £1,000 each, one at £1,230, and the net receipts of one of the messengers at Birmingham were £1,118. This is about the same remuneration as that of a County Court judge. These charges being paid or deducted, like the solicitor's bill and the official assignee's remuneration, out of the assets of the several estates, are not included in the return of the "cost of the court," which is about £80,000 a-year, the chief items being £52,000 for salaries of the commissioners, the registrars, and other officers paid by salary, and £20,000 for the inevitable "compensations" and for retiring annuities. The "judicial statistics" of last year stated the official assignees' charges for a year to be rather more than £50,000, the messengers', and brokers', and auctioneers' £47,000; the solicitors' bills above £130,000; the assets administered about £1,000,000.

OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES.—In the year 1860 the nine London official assignees received among them, for remuneration for their services, the sum of £22,563, and the 18 country official assignees, £25,821. About a third of the income (rather more in London) was absorbed by clerks' salaries and office rent and expences. The result was, that the net income ranged in London from £795 to £2,487, and in the country from £378 to £2,117, with one remarkable exception at Newcastle, where the official assignee's expences amounted to no less than £1,058, and his receipts were only £969. But the receipts of the whole body were sufficient to give a net income for each of the 27 of about £1,200 a year, if equally divided, or, in London, of above 1,700. The new Bankruptcy Bill proposes to allow them to fall in number to five in London, and seven in the country. Last year the four at Liverpool had only 78 bankruptcies to divide among them. The number of new bankruptcies in the year gave an average of 69 for each London official assignee, and 37 for each country assignee; the whole number was 1,287; the year's payment to the official assignees was £48,384. But a portion of their business arises not from bankruptcies, but for petitions arrangements, so that £45,000 may be as much as they received from bankrupt estates, or about £35 per each bankruptcy of the year.

It is stated that the health of Matthew Davenport Hill, Esq., Q.C., Recorder of Birmingham, is in such a precarious state as to necessitate his leaving England for Guernsey.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A case decided on Monday last by the Lords Justices upon an appeal in the Court of Chancery definitively affirms the right of suitors in every case, and at every stage of a cause, requiring judicial consideration, and not involving merely official details, to have the decision of the judge himself, whether in court or in chambers, and not of one of his chief clerks. In the case in question, namely, In re The Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, the chief clerk had appointed an official manager to this company, which was being wound up under an order. The appointment being objected to by the appellants, the learned judge (the Master of the Rolls) refused to consider the question of the appointment, and required its opponents to show that the gentleman appointed was an improper person, thus involving the hearing of the case as on an appeal from the decision of the chief clerk. In remarking upon this state of facts Lord Justice Turner, in a very elaborate and emphatic judgment, observed that "every suitor has the unqualified right to have his case heard before the judge himself." The question raised upon this appeal has been frequently discussed in an incidental manner, but never expressly or satisfactorily settled until now. Practically a very large amount of business of a quasi judicial character comes before the chief clerks, and no doubt, in very many instances, where it can be done with the consent of competent parties, such a proceeding is extremely convenient and economical, and very much tends to the progress of business. But where the parties are at arms length, and determined upon having their rights decided by the judge himself, it is certainly very desirable that they should not be driven to undergo a preliminary contest before the chief clerk; and this rule has hitherto operated unjustly, and with great severity in many cases, where the party who has failed before the chief clerk has been obliged to submit to the risk of an intermediate appeal to a court to which he was entitled to have come in the first instance.

The Bankruptcy Bill as amended by the Select Committee of the House of Lords has been printed, and by this time its provisions as altered are generally understood. We shall, therefore, refer to them but briefly. The new print of the Bill shows at a glance the alterations which have been made. The principal one is that which strikes out the clauses relating to the constitution of a new Court of Appeal, and the appointment of a chief judge. The effect of the Bill as it now stands would be to leave the law of bankruptcy to be administered by the present commissioners and the judges of county courts, with an appeal from both to the Lords Justices of the Court of Chancery, according to the existing practice. An important change has also been made in the clause relating to the persons who are to be subject to the Act. According to the 81st section, as it stood originally, all debtors, whether traders or not, were to be liable to be adjudged bankrupts, and it was to be no longer necessary to show any trading on the part of the debtor; but the Bill as amended provides that no debtor who is not a trader shall be adjudged bankrupt, except in respect of an act of bankruptcy described as applicable to a non-trader. Another change made is in reference to the appointment of creditors, to the exclusion of official assignees. The Bill provided that creditors might at their option resort either to the official assignee or appoint their own assignee, to whom the official assignee was to render accounts, and who might in fact be thus made the manager of the bankrupt estate. The Select Committee have struck out all the clauses providing for this scheme; and the Committee also refuse to permit private arrangements to be effected unless all the creditors can be found. The whole of the set of clauses relating to the powers of the Court of Bankruptcy in aid of the Court of Chancery have been struck out, and so also has been the clause enabling a judge or commissioner to direct the indictment and criminal prosecution of a bankrupt. The greater number of alterations made in the Bill have been by way of subtraction, but there are some important additions. Among the latter are to be especially noticed a clause enabling the Court to dispose, for the benefit of creditors, of any estate at law or in equity, which at adjudication or afterwards before order of discharge, a bankrupt has in copyholds, and to make an order vesting the estate in such manner as the Court shall think fit; and also a clause providing against the sale of the life estate in remainder of a bankrupt before it falls into possession, and another providing that the estate tail of a non-trader insolvent not in possession shall not be barred without his consent. In addition to the alterations made by the Select Committee, Lord Chelmsford has given notice of his intention to move that a non-trader be not liable to be made bankrupt except on the petition of a creditor whose debt is contracted after the passing of the Bill. The Select Committee merely inserted a clause providing that a non-trader shall not be made bankrupt on a debt contracted already, if he is at the commencement of the Act entitled to any estate or property which is subject to forfeiture in case he should be bankrupt. Some minor distinctions have been made in the Select Committee between a trader and a non-trader. A proviso has been inserted that a non-trader abroad already shall not be deemed to remain abroad with intent to defeat or delay his creditors (an act of bankruptcy) until the expiration of six months after the passing of the Bill. Lying in prison for debt for fourteen days is to be an act of bankruptcy in a trader, but it must be for two months in the instance of a non-trader (an execution against a person's goods is not by the Bill an act of bankruptcy if he is not a trader). A non-trader is also to be allowed longer time (two months, as against seven days for a trader) before a judgment-debtor summons can be taken out against him on non-payment of money ordered to be paid by a decree in equity; but the same distinction was already in the Bill in respect to judgment-debtor summonses for judgment debts. Lastly, the power given in the Bill to the Bankruptcy Court to refuse the bankrupt's "order of discharge" or sentence him to a year's imprisonment, if the Court shall be of opinion "that his insolvency is attributable to rash and hazardous speculation or unjustifiable extravagance in living," has by the Select Committee been limited to the case of traders.

The Select Committee have made numerous minute alterations in the language of the Bill, but we regret to find they have allowed Schedule G. to stand. Some weeks ago we pointed out the inconvenient and anomalous mode adopted in this schedule of repealing former Acts of Parliament, the effect of which if passed into law will involve the statutes relating to bankruptcy in far greater confusion than they have ever yet been.

It is understood that Sir Richard Bethell had made all his arrangements and was fully prepared on Tuesday evening last for the introduction to the House of Commons of his concentration of courts scheme; and a number of gentlemen interested in the question were present in the hope of hearing his speech on the occasion. The great delay, however, which has been caused to all other business by the debates upon the Budget, has up to the present time prevented the Attorney-General from bringing forward his measure, and we fear it is now so late in the session that it must be postponed until next year.

MARITIME PUBLIC LAW—BELLIGERENT RIGHTS. No. I.

A brief account of belligerent rights in general may facilitate a view of the present state of international law, as regards such rights at sea. We may premise that writers on this subject are unanimous in the opinion that the rights of belligerents are unaffected by the character of the war, whether it be just or unjust, international or civil. Certain modes of offence and redress, short of war, were formerly often resorted to by sovereign states against each other. These species of hostilities, which were the originals of the present rights of belligerents, are usually divided into four classes. The first consists of embargoes or sequestrations on the property of the enemy found within the territory of the antagonist state. To the second class belongs the taking of forcible possession of the thing in dispute. The third comprehends the right of vindictive retaliation (retorsio facti), or of equitable retaliation (retorsion de droit), which latter phrase is used to denote the meting to the other nation the precise measure which itself has used. The fourth consists of reprisals upon the persons and property of the enemy. This last species of redress includes all the former ones, and is inferior only to actual war, without which it has seldom in later times been practised. Reprisals are termed positive, when they are comprised under any of the foregoing classes, or negative, when a state merely refuses to fulfil its engagements. Reprisals are also either general, or special. The former consist of commissions or letters of marque delivered in time of war to the officers and subjects of a belligerent. Special reprisals mean letters of marque delivered in time of peace by the supreme authority in a state to such of its subjects as have suffered injury from the government, or subjects, of another state. These guerilla hostilities show, as it were, that the individual has not surrendered all his rights of self-defence to the body politic; at least, not without an implied condition that these are to be regranted to him upon a fitting occasion. This species of political disintegration has, however, become almost obsolete in time of peace. That it is not equally avoided in time of war we may observe in the present tactics of America.

The latest formal declaration of war by heralds-at-arms was made by France against Spain at Brussels in 1635. The present usage is to publish a manifesto, such as appeared in the London Gazette in 1854 upon the breaking out of the Russian war, or such as was lately issued by the American Presidents.

It has been almost settled by modern usage, that property of the enemy lying within the territory of a belligerent state, and debts due to the former, especially public debts, or funded property, are not liable to confiscation, at the commencement of hostilities. This, however, is not an inflexible rule. Great Britain has frequently condemned, as droits of Admiralty, the property of the enemy found in its ports at the commencement of war. The law of early times, as found in Magna Charta itself, was less severe. "The enemy's merchants," the Great Charter declares, "are to be kept and treated as our own merchants are kept and treated in their country." The right of withdrawing property, and other like conditions, are usually provided for by express treaties. The right of the supreme authority to issue letters of marque and reprisal for future seizures, after war has been fully announced, is unquestioned. Any subsequent trading with the enemy without an express ordinance or license, is illegal, and may be punished by confiscation; The Franklin, Robinson's Adm. Rep., vol. iv. p. 195. Ravaging an enemy's territory is not deemed lawful, unless it be indispensable for strategic operations, or retaliation.

The ancient laws of war have been long relaxed as to the confiscation of private property on land. But, prior to 1854, the maritime code of warfare, in general, showed little lenity. This dissimilarity in the operation of the laws of war by land and by sea, has been advocated upon the ground that contributions are levied by land, even though the territory be not ravaged, that the object of warfare by land is territorial acquisitions, and, consequently, that the conqueror is expected to treat his future subjects with leniency; but that the sole object of maritime warfare is the destruction of the enemy's power. These data appear to us to be wholly unwarranted. Wars by land and by sea have, or may have, the same object—conquest, self-defence, or revenge. But, in neither of these cases, can we find any ground for justifying the establishment of a different code for the immunities of private property on land, from that which regulates the security of the same property when at sea. It appears to be altogether unreasonable, that a strict code should prevail with naval powers, and a lax one with states whose strength is chiefly military—that the former should permit and authorize privateering, and every species of injury to the private property of the enemy; but that soldiers and volunteers should not be permitted to do similar acts on land. Nevertheless, captures made by private armed vessels without a commission, and without the plea of self-defence, are so far deemed legal by the law of nations as to prevent the captors from being punished as piratical. Such captures are termed prizes of war, or droits of Admiralty, and are condemned to the Government.

The practice of issuing commissions by the state to private armed vessels has been hitherto sanctioned by the laws of every maritime nation. Various efforts have been made by philanthropists and statesmen to have this system abolished. The treaty negotiated by Franklin between the United States and Prussia, in 1785, stipulated against this system. The French Legislative Assembly, in 1792, unsuccessfully proposed that both privateering, and the taking of private property by sea, should be abolished by mutual agreement amongst nations. The United States Government proposed to conclude a compact to this effect with Great Britain in 1824; but the offer was declined, notwithstanding that England has more private property to lose upon the ocean, than any other nation. The United States has deserved well of juridical philanthropists with respect to this question. The treaties of that country in 1778 with France, in 1794 with England, in 1782 with the Netherlands, in 1836 with Peru-Bolivia, in 1788 and 1799 with Prussia, in 1795 with Spain, and in 1783 and 1816 with Sweden, all provided that, if any citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties took a commission or letters of marque for privateering against the other, from any power with whom the other was at war, he might be treated as a pirate. Latterly, neutral states forbid their subjects from accepting letters of marque from belligerents. The neutral powers did so during the late Russian war, and even forbade the entry of foreign privateers into their ports; and neither England or France issued letters of marque during the Russian war.

The national courts of the captor have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of captures made during war under the authority of the captors' government. To this rule there are only two exceptions:—where the capture is made in a neutral state; or when it is made by armed vessels fitted out within the neutral territory. In these cases, the courts of the neutral state have exclusive jurisdiction, and no consular authority of the country of the captor is ever allowed to have a voice as to such prize of war. The sentence of the court of the capturing nation is conclusive as to the rights of the parties before it. The sentence, however, if unjust (plane contra jus judicatum), affords ground for reprisals to the injured nation. Municipal courts differ from courts of prize in this respect; the sentences of the former in questions of international law having never been deemed to afford ground for reprisals or a casus belli. However much we may sympathise with the recent political changes on the Continent, yet we do think that a Government ought in all cases to prohibit its subjects from engaging in the service of belligerents, and, a fortiori, in cases of civil war. It was with pleasure, therefore, we saw that the foreign enlistment Act, 59 Geo. 3, c. 69, was brought fresh to the public mind by the recent royal proclamations.

The unlawfulness of belligerent captures on neutral territory is incontestably established. How far this acknowledged immunity extends to vessels on the high seas is a question which has, as we have shown, experienced a variety of practical solutions. The vessels of every State are subject only to the municipal laws of the State to which they belong, except as to crimes, such as piracy, which every nation has obviously an equal right to punish, or other offences that manifestly involve a violation of international law. Is the belligerent right of capturing enemy's property inconsistent with the claims of municipal law, or does it follow from the general principles of the international code? The right of capture may confessedly be exercised within the territory of a belligerent, or in a place belonging to no one—in short, in any place except in the territory of a neutral State. Is the vessel of a neutral on the high seas to be considered as protected against visitation and search, just as the residence of the owner confessedly is? As to the public vessels of neutrals, the rights of visitation and search have never been claimed by belligerents. Private vessels on the high seas, however, are not considered to be equally privileged. The general rules of international law as to such maritime captures are—that the goods of an enemy on board a neutral vessel may be confiscated; but that the goods of a neutral on board an enemy's vessel are free. The constant practice of belligerent nations from the earliest times has been to adhere to the former proposition; and even the neutral vessel has sometimes shared the same fortune. The marine ordinances of Louis XIV. prescribed this regulation from the year 1681 to 1744. This extreme rule, however, has been confined to special periods in the jurisprudence of France and Spain. It has not prevailed with other countries. As the goods of an enemy found on board the ships of a neutral or of an ally are liable to capture, so a converse rule has been, though without equal reason, sought to be established—that the goods of an ally on board an enemy's vessel should follow the fate of the vessel. This rule, which obtains in the marine ordinances before mentioned, violates all justice and principle. An enemy's goods are liable to be seized anywhere except on neutral territory, and a ship is not territorial or immovable; but the goods of a friend are not in other cases deemed liable to capture in any place, unless they are contraband of war, or are connected with a breach of blockade. The maxim "Free ships, free goods," does not, therefore, except by a verbal antithesis, involve the converse proposition, that "enemy's ships make enemy's goods." Accordingly, this view was held in the case of The Nereide, 1 Cranch Rep. vol. 9, p. 388, Amer. Rep. upon the construction of the treaty concluded between America and Spain in 1795. Trading with the enemy was almost completely legitimated, as to England and France, by the declaration made by these powers in March, 1854. This manifesto adopted the rule "Free ships, free goods;" it relinquished the right of confiscating neutral goods in enemies' vessels, and authorised not only neutral trade with the enemy, but even allowed British merchants so to trade, provided the goods were embarked on board neutral vessels—a provision which British merchants were not likely to infringe by sending their ships into the enemy's ports, where they would be sure of meeting a fate similar to that experienced by the trireme which carried Regulus to Carthage.

There has been a constant tendency for the past two centuries to adopt in practice the maxim "Free ships, free goods." The States General of the United Provinces, the greatest carriers in Europe, as Adam Smith observes, obtained this concession in 1650 from Spain; in 1662 from France; and in 1668 and 1774 from England. The same stipulation "Free ships, free goods," with the technical and unreal correlative "Enemy's ships, enemy's goods," was contained in the treaty concluded between France and Spain in 1659, and in that formed by England with Portugal in 1654. This stipulation was omitted in the revised treaty of 1810. The same principle is adopted by the treaties of Utrecht of 1713, 1721, and 1739; by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle of 1748; of Paris in 1763; and of Versailles in 1783, between Great Britain, France, and Spain. The celebrated armed neutrality of 1780 adopted the maxim "Free ships, free goods," without the dark correlative. The two maxims were again adopted by the commercial treaty concluded in 1786 between France and England. But the treaty of Amiens in 1802, and that of Paris in 1814, omit all mention of such provisions. During the protracted wars of the French Revolution, liberal principles were discarded by all parties alike. In 1807, however, the principles of the armed neutrality were proclaimed anew by Russia. In 1780, the American Government adopted the principles of the armed neutrality, upon condition that they should be reciprocally acknowledged by the belligerent states. Since that time they have recognised the general law of nations already stated—that the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are free, and that the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are lawful prize; but the States have always endeavoured to render the law more liberal. In 1785, they stipulated with Prussia that "Free ships should make free goods," without the obnoxious correlative "Enemy's ships enemy's goods." The former maxim does not mean that a neutral flag can be used to protect enemy's property in the ship as well as the cargo; The Citade de Lisboa, Robinson's Adm. Rep. vol. vi. p. 358. The belligerent policy of England has, as a general rule, conformed to the above-mentioned law of nations, which is based upon the Consolato del Mare. The rule, however, that neutral goods on board an enemy's vessel are free, has been often rendered nugatory by an arbitrary law of contraband, and by the prohibition of the enemy's coasting and colonial trade, which sometimes involved a cessation of all neutral commerce. The plea of the right of search has also often enabled England to institute a police over all neutral navigation. These investigations have been extended even to the ascertainment of the nationality of the crew, with a view of subjecting them, if liable, to impressment for the British military marine. The decrees of Francis I. of France, in 1543, were the most severe of the laws of any nation in respect to neutrals. These ordinances condemned enemy's property on board neutral vessels, the vessels themselves and the rest of the cargo, and also the goods of a friend when found on board an enemy's vessel. If England and France maintained, during war, the peculiar principles of their respective maritime codes, all neutral commerce should cease. Neutral property, if in an enemy's vessel, would be good prize to the French cruiser, while neutral ships would be searched by English officers and brought into an English port to the interruption of the voyage. Any allowance, either as freight or for damages, would be a very inadequate compensation for these hardships. Accordingly, the changes effected by the declaration of 1854 were recommended by rude necessity.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S-INN.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR.)

June 5.—In re Ward.—This was a petition of several freeholders and justices of the peace for the county of Stafford, including the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, praying that the Lord Chancellor would be pleased to remove William Webb Ward, coroner of one of the districts of the said county of Stafford, from his office, in consequence of misbehaviour in his said office. The petition prayed the removal of Mr. Ward from the office of coroner, on the ground that he had been guilty of habitual carelessness and neglect in the discharge of his duties, and that he was totally unfit for such office.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment, said that he was of opinion all the allegations in the petition had been fully substantiated. Mr. Ward appeared to have hardly acted like a rational creature, and he had been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty in not proceeding with an inquest after a jury had been duly summoned. The order would be that Mr. Ward be removed from his office of coroner, and that a writ be issued for the election of a new coroner.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER.

(Sittings in Banco, before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, and Justices WIGHTMAN, CROMPTON, and BLACKBURN.)

June 3.—After hearing motions, the Court took the New Trial Paper, but considerable difficulty was experienced in proceeding in consequence of the absence of the leading counsel at the Nisi Prius sitting at Guildhall.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, in allusion to this circumstance, said the Court had not yet come to any final determination, but were deliberating on the propriety of putting an end to the London sittings at Nisi Prius during term. It was proposed to add to the London sittings after term, and only to take undefended causes in London during term.

Mr. Bovill, Q.C., said he thought this arrangement would be a great convenience to the public.

June 4.—Day v. Hemings.—This case came before the Court upon demurrer to the defendant's pleas.

The plaintiff, T. F. A. Day, was a printer in Carey-street, Lincoln's-inn, and he sued the defendant, William Hemings, a chancery barrister, to recover the sum of £222 5s. 1d., being the balance of an account for printing the Law Chronicle for the defendant, who was editor and proprietor. The defendant, among other pleas, pleaded that the printing in question was done in the city of Westminster and county of Middlesex, by a printing press, types, &c., which the plaintiff had not caused to be registered by the clerk of the peace for the county of Middlesex, as required by the statute, the 39th Geo. 3, c. 79, amended by 2 & 8 Vict. There was a second plea, in which the defendant pleaded that the said printing press and types were not registered by the clerk of the peace for the city of Westminster. To these pleas the plaintiff demurred.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said that, however willing the Court might be to get rid of such a defence as that raised, if they could, the statute seemed clear that if the printing press was not registered, the plaintiff could not recover. However they might regret it, they were still bound by the statute. On the face of the plea, the defence did not appear to be a meritorious one. It might be, however, that upon the whole transaction such a plea might be honestly pleaded, and the defendant might feel that he had a right to defend himself per fas et nefas. Still, it seemed to partake more of the nefas, and, if the learned counsel could show the Court how to get rid of it, they would gladly do so.

It was then argued for the plaintiff that the statute of Victoria substituted the office of the clerk of the peace for Middlesex as the place of registry, instead of the office of the clerk of the peace for Westminster, and the answer to the one plea was, that the printing press might have been registered in Middlesex, and the answer to the other plea was, that it might have been registered in Westminster.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said he thought that would do, and called upon the defendant's counsel to support his pleas; but he failed to satisfy the Court that either of the pleas, by itself, was an answer to the action; and

The COURT, with evident pleasure, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

(Before Sir C. CRESSWELL.)

June 5.—Vivian v. Vivian.—This suit by a wife came before the Court upon an application for alimony pendente lite.

Mr. Vivian was examined in support of his answer to the petition for alimony, and cross-examined by Dr. Phillimore. In his cross-examination he denied that at an interview at which Mr. Smart and a gentleman named Peate were present, he had, in answer to a question, stated a certain sum as the amount of his property. Mr. Peate was afterwards called by Dr. Phillimore to contradict him upon this point, and at the close of his examination.

Mr. Smart said he felt bound to tender himself as a witness to corroborate the statement of his client.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—If you choose to do so no one can prevent you. You must exercise your own discretion. I have never seen such a proceeding before in the course of forty-two years' experience.

Mr. Smart then went into the witness-box and took the oath, and gave an account of the interview in support of the respondent's statement.

His LORDSHIP awarded alimony at the rate of £180 a-year.

On the 4th instant, at what is called a Court of Hastings, held in Guildhall, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Alderman and Sheriff Abbas, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Alderman Rose, and several members of the livery, the legal formalities for giving effect to the recent endowment of five scholarships in connexion with the City of London School were consummated. At the conclusion of the ceremony, Mr. Tee, of the Lord Mayor's Court, who acted as Clerk of the Court of Hastings, proclaimed the circumstances under which the several endowments were made, and in this the interest of the occasion lay. The first consisted of a grant to trustees of £2,000 Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, by Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild, to found and endow a scholarship for the maintenance and education, at an English or foreign university, of one scholar, to be selected from among the pupils of every religious persuasion in the City of London School, and to be tenable for four years, provided he shall properly conduct himself, and shall with due diligence pursue his studies for the purpose of qualifying himself to graduate at the university to which he may belong, "with honour to the founder of the scholarship and with credit to himself and the school." The next is a scholarship founded and endowed with the sum of £1,333 odd, by the Jews' Commemoration Fund Committee. This, like the preceding one, is to be open to all the pupils of the school of every religious persuasion, who are not more than sixteen, and shall have been three years in the school, and it is tenable for three years. The third is "the Masterman Scholarship," endowed with £1,000, the surplus of a fund subscribed by merchants, bankers, traders, and citizens for a testimonial to Mr. Masterman on his retirement from Parliament. The dividends are to be applied in enabling a scholar of the school to continue his studies at a university for a period of four years from the date of his matriculation. Lastly, Mr. Tite, M.P., has given £1,500 for the foundation of two scholarships, one of £25, and the other of £20 a year, open to pupils not more than sixteen, and who have been three years in the school, by a competitive examination, and to be held during good behaviour and so long as the successful competitor remains at the school.

A deputation had an interview on Friday, the 31st ult., with the Right Hon. F. Peel, at the Treasury, with reference to the present mode of payment of procurators fiscal in respect of proceedings in criminal cases in Scotland.

The following gentlemen were called to the bar on the 6th inst. Inner Temple:—William Willis, Esq., B.A. (holder of the Studentship awarded in Michaelmas Term, 1860); Joseph Green, Esq., B.A., (Certificate of Honour); Emanuel Maguire Underdown, Esq. (Certificate of Honour); Montague Woodinass, Esq., B.A.; St. Aubyn Barrett Lennard, Esq., M.A.; Reginald Carew Glanville, Esq., B.A.; Andrew Thomson, Esq., B.A., LL.B.; John Simson, Esq., Thomas Child Hayllar, Esq., S.C.L.; Markham John Law, Esq., B.A.; Daniel Birt, Esq., George Thomas Edwards, Esq., B.A.; Arthur Yardley, Esq., and Stuart Rendel, Esq., M.A.

Middle Temple:—John Houston, Esq. (holder of the Certificate of Honour, first class for the Council of Legal Education); James Johnson, Esq., Anthony Blake Rathborne, Esq., Robert Armstrong, Esq., Henry Finch, Esq., George Rattray Fenton, Esq. and William Draper Bolton, Esq.

Lincoln's-inn:—Gerald Fitz Gibbon, jun., Esq., George Holford, Esq., M.A.; Daniel Jones, Esq., M.A.; Thomas Watson, Esq., B.A.; Charles Nicholas Warton, Esq., Robert Dalby, Esq., B.A.; Charles Henry Blake, Esq., B.A.; George Hanbury Field, Esq., M.A.; Augustin William Langdon, Esq., B.A.; John Lindsay Johnston, Esq., M.A.; William Henry Burch Rosher, Esq., Thomas Daniel Tremlett, Esq., M.A.; Anthony Wood Freeland, Esq., B.A.; Richard Welford, Esq., John Irving Courtenay, Esq., M.A.; Christopher John Cottingham, Esq., J. Bamfield Street, Esq., B.A.; and Regd. Parker, Esq., B.A.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 3.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Lord CHELMSFORD gave notice that in committee on the Bankruptcy Bill he should move as an amendment the omission of the retrospective clauses of the Bill affecting non-traders.

MARRIAGE LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion that this Bill be reported with amendments, Lord REDERDALE proposed that his clause for the registration of places of public worship for Roman Catholics in Ireland should be added to the Bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR was glad of this opportunity of correcting a misapprehension which had gone abroad, that he had consented to the two clauses of his noble friend being added to the Bill. He had consented to certain amendments moved by the noble lord, which he thought unnecessary but harmless, being introduced with the most laudable object of preventing clandestinity, and to preserve the evidence of marriage; but the other two clauses he had strongly condemned, and, instead of carrying them out, he said he would rather abandon the Bill altogether. The clause was condemned in Ireland, not only by Roman Catholic priests, but by persons of all religious persuasions.

The BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR said the clause was most objectionable in its character, and would have a very injurious effect.

The clause was negatived without a division.

Wednesday, June 5.

MARRIAGE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR this Bill was read a third time and passed.

Friday, June 7.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Lord HILL presented a petition in favour of this Bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition to the same effect. The petition was especially in favour of those clauses of the Bill which conferred jurisdiction on the county courts.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

In reply to Mr. HADFIELD,

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL stated that he was unable to name a day on which he would proceed with these Bills. He would however, bring them forward as early as the exigencies of the public business would allow.

Tuesday, June 4.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. G. DUFF asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government was prepared to advise her Majesty to issue her Royal commission to inquire into the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, as well as of Harrow, Rugby, the Charterhouse, Christ's Hospital, and all endowed, collegiate, cathedral, and prebendal schools in Great Britain and Ireland in which the Greek and Latin languages are taught, with a view to ascertain whether the great resources of these institutions might not be rendered more serviceable to education and learning.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said he had announced on a former occasion that the Government were willing to accede to the principle of an inquiry into the large public schools. The doubt which they had was whether an inquiry by a Royal commission would be sufficiently effective for obtaining the desired information; but he had since communicated with the authorities of the principal public schools, and he found that they were generally disposed to give information to a Royal commission. There would, therefore, be no necessity for doing what he should have been very unwilling to resort to—viz., asking Parliament to pass a Bill giving compulsory powers to a Royal commission for the purpose. The case of one public school—Winchester—was yet, however, under the consideration of the Government. A doubt arose in that case from the fact that it had recently been made the subject of a detailed examination by the Oxford University Commission, and as Winchester College therefore had been investigated recently and regulated by competent authority, it might not be necessary to include it within the scope of the inquiry.

In reply to a subsequent inquiry from Mr. G. DUFF,

Sir G. LEWIS said that his understanding of the commission was that it would include all endowed schools in which the Greek and Latin languages were taught, but with respect to prebendal and cathedral schools he would not give any positive answer.

Wednesday, June 5.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH RELIEF BILL.

Mr. LOCKE moved the second reading of this Bill, which he explained had for its object to allow witnesses in criminal cases, who had religious objections to taking an oath, to make an affirmation.

Mr. C. ESTCOURT thought it highly inconvenient that the Bill should be discussed in the absence of the law officers of the Crown.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said, if the Bill became law it would have a very limited operation; and he was not aware that any danger was likely to result from the change. The Solicitor-General, who would certainly be in attendance when the Bill was committed, did not, he believed, entertain any objection to the second reading, though he had expressed doubts as to the policy of the Bill.

Mr. HENNESSY believed the measure belonged to that great category of Bills which had emanated this session from hon. gentlemen opposite, and the object of which was to ignore religion altogether. He therefore moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said the Bill merely extended to criminal cases the principle already followed in civil actions. It could not, therefore, be said to destroy the religious sanction of an oath.

Mr. ROXBURGH could not see why, if exceptions were made in favour of the conscientious scruples of persons wearing peculiar garments, such as the Quakers, others who did not belong to distinctive denominations, but equally objected to take an oath, should not be as unfettered in their action.

Mr. LONGFIELD said there was a great difference between relaxing a rule in favour of a body of persons, one of whose fixed principles it was not to take an oath, and in favour of individuals who might then for the first time feel a repugnance to swear to the truth of their own statements. This measure would hold out inducements to persons to refuse compliance with the law of the land. Although the criminal law of the country was in general well administered, there were not as many opportunities of correcting mistakes as in civil proceedings, and it was consequently most desirable that any safeguard at present existing should not be removed.

Mr. D. S. KER also expressed objections to the second reading.

The House divided with the following result :—

For the second reading	65
Against it	31
Majority	—34

The Bill was accordingly read a second time.

Friday, June 7.

Lord PALMERSTON intimated the wish of the Government to have a morning sitting on Tuesday next, for the purpose of getting forward with the Bills for consolidating the statute law.

EQUITY.

JURISDICTION IN COLONIAL MATTERS.

Hendrick v. Wood, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 588.

In this case the plaintiff and a deceased partner had carried on business in Jamaica. The partnership had terminated; and by a deed of arrangement the assets were made divisible between the late partners in a stipulated proportion. The partner who was now deceased shortly afterwards left Jamaica, whereupon the management of the outstanding assets of the firm devolved on the plaintiff. His late partner died in England, having by his will devised and bequeathed all his estate, real and personal, to three persons resident in England and two persons resident in Jamaica, and he appointed the same five persons his executors. The will was proved in England by the executors resident here, and it was proved in Jamaica by the executors resident in that island. The executors in Jamaica, with the concurrence of the executors in England, and the consent of the plaintiff, took temporary possession of the remaining assets of the firm, and disposed of part thereof. The plaintiff, who was now resident in England, had filed his bill against all the executors in England and Jamaica for a general account and winding-up of the partnership. The two executors resident in Jamaica put in a plea to the jurisdiction, averring that all their transactions had been in reference to property situate in Jamaica. There was some doubt whether this plea sufficiently averred the existence in Jamaica of a court of competent jurisdiction, which, upon the authorities, it is necessary to aver with the same particularity as in a plea at law. Vice-Chancellor Wood, however, did not think it necessary to discuss this question, as he did not see how the matter could properly be dealt with unless a suit were instituted in this country. "The plaintiff was in England, some of the executors were in England, and the arrangement was made in England; and none of the authorities applied to a case of this kind." It is quite true that none of the many authorities cited by the defendants' counsel appear to have any decisive bearing on such a case as this; but, on the other hand, the ordinary principles on which courts entertain jurisdiction in suits respecting property abroad, do not seem to furnish any distinct ground on which to rest the disallowance of this plea. Of course the English executors are amenable to the process of the Court, which would also reach the assets of the testator existing in this country. But the Court could have no power over the persons of the executors or the property of the testator in Jamaica. Supposing all the remaining assets of the late firm to be in Jamaica, as it appears they were, the plaintiff would have no difficulty in obtaining complete relief from the Court of Chancery of that island. On the other hand, it seems by no means clear that the English Court of Chancery will be able to conduct the proceedings it has entertained to a termination. It is easy to understand that a plea to the jurisdiction by the English executors would have been overruled, because there must be an equity affecting them which the Court on its ordinary principles would enforce. The case is just one of those in which it might be predicted with some confidence that the Court would assert its competency; but, nevertheless, it would be satisfactory to see some fuller elucidation of the principles on which that competency is to be maintained. Of course there is no doubt that the Court has power in any suit to direct service of its process to be effected anywhere; but the question always is, whether this power ought to be exercised in a particular case, having regard to the principles of international law which are allowed to limit the jurisdiction of the courts of all civilized communities. The decision in the present case is certainly of great importance, and it may, perhaps, be thought to deserve further discussion.

The argument against the assumption of jurisdiction in such cases was urged very forcibly by Vice-Chancellor Wood himself as counsel in the case of Whitmore v. Ryan (4 Hare 612). The plaintiffs in that case were the assignees of a bankrupt who had had extensive dealings with the defendant, formerly carrying on business at Barcelona and then residing at Dublin. The bill was for an account of what was due to the plaintiffs as assignees in respect of such dealings. There had been an order for service of subpoena in Dublin, under the General Order of 1845, which had been promulgated since the filing of the bill, and another order for the entry of appearance on default. Mr. Wood now moved, on behalf of the defendant, to discharge these orders. He argued that the Court could not entertain a suit relating solely to mercantile transactions against a merchant residing within a foreign jurisdiction, and not having business property or domicile in this country; and that so far as this question was concerned Ireland must be considered as a foreign country. The statutes under which the General Order of 1845 was framed gave the Court of Chancery no new or enlarged jurisdiction; nor could they, consistently with the principles of international law, which the Legislature must be presumed to have respected, have extended the jurisdiction of the Court to subjects not amenable to its power, but living within a foreign and independent jurisdiction. In support of this argument the following passage was quoted by the learned counsel from "Story's Conflict of Laws," sect. 539:—"Considered in an international point of view, jurisdiction, to be rightfully exercised, must be founded either upon the person being within the territory, or the thing being within the territory; for otherwise there can be no sovereignty exerted, upon the well-known maxim extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur. . . . On the other hand, no sovereignty can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits, to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions. Every exertion of authority of this sort beyond this limit is a mere nullity and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunals." There was no difference in principle arising from the circumstance that the country and jurisdiction within which the defendant resided, was a part of her Majesty's dominions. It was true that the statute 2 Will. 4, c. 33, authorized process concerning land in England to be served in places beyond England; and the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 82, enlarged the provisions of the former Act; but these statutes recognized the above cited principles of international law, for they proceeded on the basis that the thing, although not the person, was within the territory. The case of a suit for an account of mercantile transactions which took place in a foreign country was wholly without the scope of those statutes. The General Order of 1845 must be treated, not as introducing a new jurisdiction, but as applying only to the jurisdiction already existing. The foregoing argument did not prevail with Vice-Chancellor Wigram, and, therefore, it is hardly to be expected that it should prevail with succeeding judges. His Honour declined altogether to enter into the question whether the Act or the Order made in pursuance of it were proper or not proper with reference to the principles of international law. He felt no doubt that the General Order authorized the order then in question, and indeed he assumed that that Order empowered the Court, if it should think fit, to order service of a subpoena on a foreigner who had never been within the jurisdiction. "My opinion is," said Sir James Wigram, "that the Order does in terms give the Court authority to do so; and I cannot see that such an order, exercised with discretion, does in any respect violate the rules of natural justice. The Order does not give the plaintiff a right to call upon the Court in all cases to order service of the subpoena abroad, but it gives the Court power to do so, in exercise of a sound discretion, according to the circumstances of the case." We may remark upon this passage that it comes practically to almost the same thing whether the power of the Court is considered as limited by international principles, or whether the power is taken to be unlimited, but it is said that this power must be exercised with a discretion which, if it deserves the name, will proceed upon the very same principles. There are, indeed, abundant instances in which the general words of Acts of Parliament have been treated by the Courts as capable of limitation by reference to those principles. We may mention, for example, that the famous litigation in Brook v. Brook would never have arisen if it had not been thought at least plausible to propose some limit to the general words of Lord Lyndhurst's Act. However, as we have said, it makes little difference whether the question be viewed as one of the power of the Court or of the propriety of the exercise of that power; and therefore we conceive that Mr. Wood's argument in Whitmore v. Ryan will deserve attention whenever an application for the exercise of this discretion comes before the Court, and also whenever what is substantially the same question is raised upon a plea to the jurisdiction, as in the case which has suggested these remarks. Sir James Wigram, in the judgment from which we have before quoted, enunciated a principle which, if it were to be fully carried into effect, would completely banish from the Court of Chancery the conception of international law. He said—"The material question in judicial proceedings is, whether the defendant has due notice of the proceedings, so that he may be enabled to come in and make his defence, and not whether he receives that notice at Boulogne or Dover." In the case before him, the defendant had been in England, and had suddenly returned to Ireland. This circumstance may not improperly have had weight in guiding the discretion of the Court; but on the other hand the question may be asked, why did not the plaintiff file his bill in Dublin.

There are several recent cases in which the Court has ordered service of subpoena in Scotland, but in two of them (Innes v. Mitchell, 5 W. R. 748; and Maclean v. Dawson, 7 W. R. 438), the orders appealed from were affirmed only by one of the Lords Justices in the face of doubts expressed by the other (Sir George Turner) as to the propriety of exercising the jurisdiction. In all these cases the principal question seems to have been whether litigation in England was, in the view of the Court, convenient, and, therefore, it would not be very easy to extract from them any general principle. It may, however, be observed that a person resident in Scotland might appear and defend a suit in an English court much more conveniently than a person resident in Jamaica. In the case before us Vice-Chancellor Wood appears to have attached some importance to the plaintiff's presence in England, but he did not explain upon what principle. He is also reported to have said, "the arrangement was made in England," by which he seems to mean an arrangement between the plaintiff and the executors with reference to the disposal of the assets of the firm. But, as some of the executors were resident in Jamaica, the arrangement can only be said to have been made in England in this sense, that it was made by a proposal sent from England to Jamaica, and there agreed to. The plaintiff's suit must be regarded in one of two lights—either as a suit to have a debt due from his deceased partner ascertained and paid, or as a suit for a division of existing property. If looked at in the former light, it may be said that the executors in Jamaica could be answerable only out of the assets received by them, and could be properly called to account for those assets only by a tribunal of the country in which they exercised authority. If looked at in the latter light, it may be said that the division of property existing in Jamaica belongs to the tribunals of that colony, which may for this purpose be regarded as a foreign country. On the whole, it must be admitted that this decision makes no further advance than might be expected on the previous cases, but at the same time it is difficult to see how the successive steps in this extension of jurisdiction can be justified on any principle which is certain to command the assent of the jurists of the whole civilized world.

COMMON LAW.

CONTEMPT OF COURT—PRIVILEGES OF WITNESSES—15 & 16 VICT. c. 57.

In re Fernandez, Exch., 9 W. R. 559.

The interest which at certain periods of our history attached to the legality or illegality of a "general warrant," that is to say, of an order for the incarceration of one of her Majesty's lieges without setting forth on its face the precise cause of the commitment, is happily pretty much in abeyance in our times. Yet the point slumbers only, as is evidenced by the well known instance of the Sheriff of Middlesex imprisoned under a general warrant of the House of Commons (11 A. & E. 273), and again by the present case. The law upon this subject is now perfectly established and defined (so far at least as a commitment for contempt is concerned), and is to this effect, that if the tribunal by which the warrant issues is one of the superior courts, the commitment need not set forth the particular circumstances of the contempt; but that if it is an inferior court, they must be set forth with sufficient accuracy to enable a superior tribunal to ascertain the precise ground of commitment. That this is the proper criterion seems to have been admitted in the argument for the prisoner in the present case, as well as declared to be so in the judgment of the court. The only point for decision was, in truth, whether the tribunal by which the commitment in question had been made, viz., the assize court, fell under the one or the other class of courts. To determine this, recourse was had to the division of courts given in Bacon's Abridgement (Courts D.) where courts of record are divided into "supreme, superior, or inferior," and superior courts again are subdivided into such as are more principal, and such as are less principal. And as the "more principal" are stated to comprise what are usually called the superior courts, viz., the Courts of Parliament, Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas and the Exchequer, and the "less principal" to be such as are held by commission of gaol delivery, oyer and terminer, assize and nisi prius, the Court of Exchequer in the present case felt no doubt in holding the general warrant for contempt to be perfectly legal, since it had issued from a superior court, though one of the less principal kind.

The other questions revived in the case were not disposed of by the judgment, though the Court incidentally disclosed on which side their opinion inclined. One of these was whether when a witness is asked a question which he is unwilling to answer as tending to his crimination, he, or the presiding judge, is the person to decide whether it will have the apprehended effect. It was suggested in Fisher v. Ronalds (12 C. B. 765) that the witness must judge for himself, and this opinion was endorsed by the Chief Baron in Adams v. Lloyd (3 H. & N. 357). But in the present case the Court remarked that they entirely concurred in the course taken at the trial by Mr. Justice Hill, and he certainly took this question out of the hands of the witness and decided it himself.

The remaining question in the case was as to the construction of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, an Act passed in 1852 to regulate inquiries into corrupt practices in particular constituencies, with a view to their disfranchisement. By the 9th section a witness who makes a full and true disclosure to the commissioners of inquiry, may receive from them a certificate to that effect, which will protect him from the pains and penalties mentioned therein. Among these, however, no protection is expressly given against the consequences of a parliamentary impeachment, and the ground of refusal to answer on the part of the prisoner in contempt was, that owing to this omission he was not completely protected by the certificate he had received, and was consequently entitled to avail himself of the privilege the law accords to a witness not to answer a question tending to expose him to the danger of a criminal prosecution. Mr. Justice Hill, however, held that the 9th section, notwithstanding this omission, operated as a complete protection, and though (as before observed) the point was dehors the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, it may be collected from it that they were of the same opinion.

CRIMINAL LAW.

LAW OF EVIDENCE—COLLATERAL FACTS, WHEN ADMISSIBLE—COINING.

Reg. v. Weeks (C. C. R.), 9 W. R. 553.

This case is chiefly noticed in order to point out its precise connection with Reg. v. Holt, of which an account was formerly given*, and with which it seems at first sight somewhat at variance. Reg. v. Holt was a case in which the conviction of a prisoner for obtaining money under false pretences was quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal, by reason of evidence against him at his trial having been admitted to prove that he had obtained from a person not the prosecutor, on a previous occasion to that then charged, a sum of money, on a pretence similar to that which he was then charged with having used—such previous obtaining not being in any way referred to in the indictment. This admission was very properly held by the Court to be a fatal miscarriage in the Court, as it offended against the general principle, excluding as evidence that which does not tend to prove the point in issue. But this principle does not prevent the admissibility of a collateral fact, if it raises any reasonable presumption as to the principal matter in dispute, for this does tend to prove the point in issue; and hence when the person has committed several felonies so connected together as to form part of one transaction, evidence of all may be properly given to show the character of the whole (see R. v. Ellis, 6 B. & Cr. 157); and evidence has been also received of facts which happened before or after the matter charged in the indictment against the prisoner. The ground for this practice is, that such facts are evidentiary of the animus of the prisoner with regard to the matter with which he stands charged; and it has consequently been more freely used when the conduct of the prisoner is compatible with innocence, unless his guilty knowledge or intent can be reasonably established by some positive evidence. This is peculiarly the case with regard to the charge made in the present instance, viz., that of having knowingly and with guilty intent the possession of coining instruments. It is possible to have such possession innocently, and therefore, such a collateral as the prisoner's passing bad money on a previous occasion directly bears upon his guilt or innocence on the charge on which he is tried. Evidence at the trial to this effect was accordingly admitted in the present case, and upheld by the court of criminal appeal, the Chief Baron observing, that in such indictments other substantive collateral felonies might be proved without limit in order to prove the scienter. See also R. v. Lewis (2 Russ. C. & M., 407), and R. v. Harris (7 C. & P., 419).

EMBEZZLEMENT BY COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER—LAW AS TO
Reg. v. Bremley (C. C. R.), 9 W. R. 555.

This case most resembles one of which we gave an account when it was decided in the early part of the present year. But in *R. v. May, the prisoner (who was paid by several houses of business a commission on all orders he could obtain, his duty being to receive payment for the orders, and to hand over the balance to the house by whom they were executed,) was acquitted on an indictment charging him with having embezzled part of the money he had so received for one of his employers on the ground that the relationship of master and servant did not exist between him and the prosecutor, as he was not under any species of control, but went about at his own will and pleasure whenever he thought it likely he could obtain orders for any of his employers. But in the present case there was a distinct engagement of the prisoner by the prosecutor as their "commercial traveller," although he was also at liberty under the agreement to obtain orders for other persons. The Court held that, under these circumstances, the prisoner was under the control of the prosecutor, and was therefore properly convicted under the statute.

The two cases are not very intelligible when considered together, but it would appear the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved intend that "control" or "no control" is the proper test; and if so, it would seem proper in these cases for the judge expressly to take the opinion of the jury as to the nature of the relationship between the prisoner and the prosecutor—that is, whether "agent and principal," or "servant and master." If the jury think the former, then Reg. v. May is an authority for the prisoner's acquittal; if the latter, then the present case shows he may be rightly convicted under the statute of Geo. 4.

Correspondence.

CONVEYANCING COUNSEL TO THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

SIR,—As a recent appointment has drawn attention to that branch of the reformed Court of Chancery which consists of the six conveyancing counsel, and has provoked some remarks, made apparently without sufficient knowledge and consideration, I think it not inopportune to submit a few observations, less with the view of expressing any opinion as to the expediency of such an appendage to the court than of correcting erroneous impressions, and, if the subject is to be re-opened, of bringing it more fairly under discussion.

1. What is the aggregate value of the obnoxious "monopoly?" Somewhere, I believe, about £6,000 a-year. Of the six counsel originally appointed, some, I am assured, have profited little beyond the honour of having been selected by a Lord Chancellor familiar with the law of property, and with the names and merits of its leading practitioners. In more than one instance, the court business (claiming, as Lord Chancellor Cranworth intimated to the late Mr. Brodie, the right of preaudience), has displaced other and better business, and has not swelled the fee-book of the monopolist, who, if the six were now swept away without compensation (and it is not probable that they would retire, like the six clerks, under a golden shower, or even with a proctor's pension), would have sacrificed permanent practice to a temporary honour. That honour, too, must decline in proportion as the standard of eligibility is lowered.

2. The court business is by no means of a character so desirable as that which ordinarily falls to the portion of a well-reputed conveyancing counsel, whose practice is made up of abstracts on purchases, cases, points referred, consultations, conferences, &c., involving less dull, dry, mechanical drudgery more varied and interesting, and for the most part more liberally rewarded. Of the court business, titles to be investigated, and special conditions to be settled, with a view to sales ordered by the court, constitute the bulk. The late Mr. Coulson characterized this species of business as that which, of all conveyancing practice, he most disliked and eschewed. There is not one in twenty of these titles but has some difficulty or peculiarity; many are embangled and defective, and all require to be helped through the ordeal of an unwilling purchaser's scrutiny by some speciality of contract or other. We all know on what very treacherous ground the framer of special conditions is treading, and that ground, when trodden by a "monopolist," is doubly hazardous. As to the remnant of the Court business, it consists of titles to be investigated, and conveyances settled on purchases by the Court (but which purchases bear a very small proportion to the sales, and decrease with the decreasing uninvested railway funds) of settlements, partition deeds, leases, &c., all, however, of comparatively rare occurrence, and when occurring, generally of a complicated or special nature. Of mere routine, matter-of-course business, there is none.

3. Time enough has elapsed to afford the means of forming a just opinion as to the success of the experiment. There is reason to believe that, as regards purchases and sales by the Court, few instances have occurred of any serious miscarriage. As to sales, particularly in the very great majority of cases, the conditions, as settled by the conveyancing counsel, have done their work without creating any sensation in the sale-room, and with probably a considerable saving of time and expense. The head of "Settlements," whether pre-nuptial or post-nuptial, is less satisfactory. Proposals of the rawest description are often carried into chambers, and as neither the judge nor the chief clerk can be supposed to have had opportunities of becoming intimately conversant with the most approved schemes and provisions, these proposals, settled, but, perhaps, little improved, come as instructions from the Court to the conveyancing counsel, who cannot execute them with the same discretionary latitude as if he received them from an ordinary client, and the result is not unfrequently a jealous locking up of property by limitations most capricious, mischievous and absurd.

4. What was the system superseded by the appointment of the six? Take the case of a purchase or sale by the Court. If the solicitor had obtained the opinion of his own conveyancer upon the title, the Master might, and often did, refuse to adopt that opinion, either from not knowing, or from not having any confidence in the counsel, or from wishing to patronise another counsel of his own selection, and thus the fees already paid had been thrown away. Nearly every Master had his protégé, and so the old "monopoly" was not only unsanctioned, but was of a more vicious and vexatious kind. As between the two systems, it can hardly be said that the legislative provision is not the better, though it may not be positively the best. In considering the expediency of leaving the solicitor at liberty to transact this species of business in his own way, and on his own responsibility, as if acting for a client in the ordinary course,—of again (or rather of now, for the first time), throwing the Court business into the general market, it seems necessary to bear in mind the responsibility of the judge to the suitors and the public, as respects the investigation of titles, the settlement of instruments, and other conveyancing matters, either to be approved by him or to be administered under his immediate direction. Review.

A Handy Book on the Law of Infants. By JOHN EBSWORTH, Solicitor. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons. 1861.

This manual contains a tolerably comprehensive summary of the laws relating to infants. The author has dwelt chiefly upon the legal rights and liabilities of infants as determined by their status or by express contract; but he does not enter upon the more complex questions relating to real estate. This, indeed, could not well be attempted in a modest handy book of moderate size. Mr. Ebsworth, however, has left very little unsaid as to the laws connected with such classes of contracts as are chiefly entered into by infants. Thus he is copious upon the subject of infant labourers, miners, factory, dyeing, and print workers, apprentices either to trades or the sea service, and parish or union apprentices. Mr. Ebsworth's book is, therefore, likely to be very useful for reference in the first instance. It supplies a want which the voluminous and deeper works on the same subject appear to have only partially filled up.

Mr. Chambers' treatise relates only to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over the persons and property of infants. It describes this branch of protective or remedial equity in a very elaborate manner, and shows how this species of disability is provided for by the Court, which, in this respect, represents the sovereign as parens patrie. But it is incomplete, as not touching upon the status of an infant—the rights and liabilities at law. Mr. Ebsworth reminds us that a female infant could, even before the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, make a binding settlement of her personality on marriage, because the marriage operates as a transfer of such property to the husband, and it is, therefore, his settlement as well as hers. Owing to the numerous recent enactments affecting infants, a fresh edition of some one of the standard treatises, or an original book on the law of infancy, was much called for. Mr. Ebsworth, however, does not profess to enumerate all the arcana connected with this branch of law: but his book contains for its size a considerable amount of practical information. The subject is one which, like that of wills, &c., readily admits of being treated of in a handy-book. We could have wished that Mr. Ebsworth had been somewhat more copious on the subject of the advancement of infants. His manual would lead one to suppose that the Court of Chancery never allows the capital of an infant to be infringed upon for any purpose of advancement. The Court, however, will sometimes allow a part of the capital belonging to an infant to be laid out for his advancement:—per Sir William Grant, 6 Ves. 474. It will even in an extreme case allow the principal to be broken in upon even for maintenance, if the infant have no other provision. It will do the same whenever a good education is desirable and cannot be otherwise had; and the Court will act thus, even though the gift to the infant is defeasible by a condition subsequent, and there is a direction for the interest to accumulate, Marlow v. Pitfield, P. Wms. 558. Though somewhat wanting in completeness as a digest, Mr. Ebsworth's book is nevertheless a compilation that has its own merits. Like Mr. M'Pherson's treatise, it comprises the criminal as well as the civil liability of infants. It gives also an abridgment of parts of numerous statutes relating to infants, and will be found useful not only to the practitioner but also to those who take an interest in the laws relating to juvenile labour. We recommend it as a book of first reference to all who desire information on the branch of law of which it treats.

A Selection of Precedents in Conveyancing, designed as a hand-book of forms in frequent use; with practical notes. By FRANCIS HOUSMAN, of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons, 1861.

This work appears to be well calculated to supply the want of a new concise book of precedents in conveyancing occasioned by the recent numerous changes in the law of real property. Mr. Housman's book is in its size and general pretensions of an order intermediate between Crabb and Greenwood or Davison's manual. It is not half as large as Crabb's treatise; but it is, perhaps, better adapted for use than either of the latter manuals, as it is very carefully compiled, and is adapted to the recent changes in the law. Lord Cranworth's recent Act, the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145 is prefixed to the volume. As this Act is very plainly worded, the conveyancer can at a glance ascertain whether his case need special conveyancing as far as the scope of that Act is concerned. Mr. Housman gives special clauses wherever he considers the provisions of the Act to be inapplicable or inadequate. After a selection of general words and covenants for title, the book before us contains a choice collection of very concise precedents of purchase and mortgage deeds, settlements, and wills. We must notice, however, the absence of forms of agreements and of marriage articles. A book intended for urgent practical wants should not be deficient in respect to executory instruments; as it is for these mainly that concise precedents are generally sought. Where neither speed nor brevity is much required, a formal precedent may be conveniently resorted to. Mr.

Housman's book, however, gives very neat forms of instruments not executory. It is a compilation which we have little doubt will become very popular with the profession.

The notes contain a great deal of useful, and sometimes recondite matter. Thus we find a notice of the extinguishment of easements consequent upon the union in a single person of the ownership both of the lands a qua, and of the lands in qua the easement exists. The use of general words is illustrated by numerous examples. The omission of an appointment under a general power, where the appointor has also the fee, and may, therefore, convey the estate by grant is recommended by Mr. Housman, in order to avoid questions regarding covenants running with the land. This course appears to be very desirable in cases where such covenants have been entered into with the appointor, Rotch v. Wadham, 6 East 289. As to the priority in point of time which an appointment under a power would give an appointor over an assignee by grant, such an advantage does not, it would appear, balance the defect noticed. The value of this priority is also much diminished since the Judgment Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. By this Act the general powers of the conuzor of a judgment are bound, so that an appointor under such, although he has his use served out of the original seisin of the trustee so as to avoid the mesne encumbrancers of the appointor, does not avoid his judgments. A grantor without notice will, therefore, as a general rule, be in as good a position as an appointor; while a grant raises no question as to covenants running with the land. Where brevity is an object, a grant may be used, without an appointment, or at least in preference to an appointment alone. Mr. Housman suggests that the declaration in bar of dower should never be inserted in purchase deeds, in the absence of specified instructions. This suggestion will, we think, meet with universal concurrence. Dower may, possibly, be the wife's future sole source of maintenance. The 23rd section of Lord Cranworth's Trustees and Mortgagees Act, before-mentioned, which exempts purchasers from seeing to the application of the purchase-money, does not discharge them from the obligation of inquiring whether the events upon which the power of sale depends have happened. Mr. Housman alludes to Mr. Walford's pamphlet, which suggested that the operation of Lord Cranworth's Act should in all conveyances be expressly negated, and considers, judiciously, we think, that this sweeping rejection of the provisions of the Act is undesirable. It is an enactment, however, which does not supersede the necessity of all circumspection on the part of the conveyancer. We have noticed with much pleasure the care and erudition displayed throughout Mr. Housman's work, especially in the notes, although we could have wished they had been still more copious. There is little, if any, surplusage in the precedents, if we except an occasional limitation to a trustee to preserve contingent remainders not required by the context. Since the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 8, it is only in very special cases that such a limitation is necessary. On the whole, Mr. Housman's work reflects much credit on its author, and is likely to become a much-used hand-book for familiar reference.

QUESTIONS FOR THE EXAMINATION.

I.—PRELIMINARY.

1. Where, and with whom, did you serve your clerkship?
2. State the particular branch or branches of the law to which you have principally applied yourself during your clerkship.
3. Mention some of the principal law books which you have read and studied.
4. Have you attended any, and what, law lectures?

II.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

5. On non-payment of a bill of exchange by the acceptor, to whom, and how soon, should notice of the dishonour be given by an indorsee, in order to preserve the liability of any, and what, other person or persons?
6. Within what period after a bill of exchange becomes due, must an action on it under the recent Bills of Exchange Act be commenced? How does a defendant obtain power to defend such an action? and state some of the grounds on which leave to defend is granted.
7. Is there any, and if any, what mode in which a creditor for goods sold and delivered can make his debt carry interest?

8. What is the meaning of a set-off? and mention instances in which debts or demands may and may not be set-off against each other.

9. Can either a foreigner or British subject residing out of the jurisdiction of the English courts, be sued in a common law action in England, and if so, is it, or is it not necessary that the cause of action should have arisen within the jurisdiction of the English court?

10. To maintain an action for the price of goods sold but not delivered, is it necessary that the contract should be in writing? and if it is so necessary under some circumstances only, state under what circumstances.

11. Against whom should an action be brought for a debt contracted by a married woman before her marriage, and would the husband be under any liability for such debt in the event of the death of the married woman before any action is brought?

12. Within what respective periods must actions on specialties and simple contracts respectively be brought, to avoid being barred by Statutes of Limitation?

13. What steps must be taken to enable you to proceed with an action against a defendant residing within the jurisdiction of the court, who keeps out of the way, and avoids service of the writ?

14. State the number of days required for ordinary notice of trial and short notice of trial respectively.

15. Within what period must a defendant appear to a writ of ejectment in order to avoid a judgment by default?

16. To what tribunal, and under what authority, may an action involving mere matters of account, which cannot conveniently be tried by a jury, be referred by a judge?

17. What is the meaning of an interpleader?

18. Within what respective periods after service of the writ may a plaintiff sign final judgment for want of appearance, and issue execution on a writ specially endorsed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852?

19. What is the meaning and effect of demurring to an adversary's pleading?

III.—CONVEYANCING.

20. To whom, in the absence of any special custom to the contrary, do the timber and minerals upon and under the waste land of manors belong, and to whom do the timber and minerals under copyhold land belong?

21. A. dies seized of real estate and intestate, leaving a father and sister of the whole blood, and a brother of the half blood. Upon whom would the estate have descended previously to the operation of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, and upon whom would it descend subsequently to that Act?

22. Where money is settled upon trust to be invested in real estate, and to which A. (a married woman) is entitled for life, and B. (a tenant in tail) is entitled in remainder,—in what way should a transfer of their interests in the money be effected?

23. What alteration in the law has been made by the Act to amend the law of property and to relieve trustees, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, as regards the effect of a release of part of the land subject to a rent-charge or to a judgment?

24. State the interest of a husband over property of his wife of the following descriptions, as well in possession as in reversion:—real, copyhold, and leasehold estates, choses in action, and other personal property. Also state whether any alterations have been made by a recent statute in the power of a husband over a wife's reversionary property, and if so, the statute and the nature of the alteration.

25. A., having contracted to sell an estate to B., becomes bankrupt previously to the completion of the sale. In what way does the bankruptcy affect the contract, and in what way would the contract have been affected if B. had been the party becoming bankrupt?

26. If copyhold were devised to trustees upon trust for A. for life, and after his death to B. absolutely, and B. should sell his remainder, by what assurance should the property be conveyed to a purchaser, the trustee having been admitted?

27. State the law as to barring entails previously to the Fines and Recoveries, Act and how subsequently. The like of estate of married women in real property before and after the Fines and Recoveries' Act.

28. A. by will devises an estate to B., and afterwards contracts to sell the estate to C. and dies before conveyance;—who is entitled to the purchase-money, and state the authority.

29. A. devises an estate which is in mortgage to B., and appoints C. his residuary legatee; as between B. and C. who is liable to pay the mortgage-money, and state the authority.

30. When will trust estates pass under a general devise, and when will they not?

31. In what way must a gift of land to a charity be carried out to be effectual, and what description of property can be disposed of to charitable uses by will?

32. A. by will, devises an estate to his son B. in fee. B. dies in the lifetime of his father A. leaving a son who survives A. How, on A.'s death, would the estate devolve? State the authority for the answer.

33. Can a mortgagee grant a lease without the concurrence of a mortgagor, and suppose a mortgagee and mortgagor concur in granting a lease, to whom should the rent be reserved, and with whom should the covenants be entered into? State the reasons for your answer.

34. Has any alteration been made as to the liability of purchasers to see to the application of purchase-money; if so, what alteration, and when was it made?

IV. EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

35. At what stages of the suit may the respective parties, plaintiff and defendant, obtain an order for the production of documents in the possession of their opponents?

36. In what manner must a subpoena be served in order to compel the attendance of a witness?

37. If either party to a suit desires that the evidence in chief should be taken ried roce at the hearing, what is now the mode of proceeding for this purpose?

38. If a bill be filed by a husband and wife relating to the personal property of the wife, what effect, if any, will the husband's death have upon the proceedings in the suit?

39. What is the effect of enrolling a decree or order of the Master of the Rolls, or one of the Vice-Chancellors; and what is the effect of enrolling a decree of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices?

40. What are the several modes of commencing proceedings in equity?

41. Mention some of the principal matters to be commenced in the judges' chambers, and some of those to be commenced by proceedings in court.

42. When a plaintiff requires from the defendant an answer to his bill, what is the course of proceeding, and when must it be taken?

43. If an executor be sued by a simple contract creditor of his testator, and he has notice of a specialty debt, but has not assets sufficient to pay both debts, what is the proper course for the executor to take?

44. Can an alien enforce in a court of equity a trust in his favour relating to real estates or chattels real in England, or to personal estate?

45. In what stock, funds, or securities, may trustees, executors, or administrators lawfully invest moneys in their hands?

46. Has the Court of Chancery power to relieve a lessee against a forfeiture of his lease occasioned by the breach of any, and what, covenants; and if so, upon what terms?

47. Is the separate property of a married woman liable for the payment of her simple contract debts; and if so, under what circumstances?

48. If a trustee pays money under a power of attorney from a person who, at the time of payment, was dead or had revoked the power, will the trustee under any, and if any, what, circumstances be liable to repay the money?

49. Is there any, and what, difference between the order or priority of payment of the different classes of debts of a testator when the assets are legal, and when the assets are equitable?

V. BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

50. Name some of the traders liable to become bankrupt, and also state what persons are not to be deemed such traders.

51. Name some of the principal acts of bankruptcy, distinguishing those which are coercive from those which are voluntary.

52. Can a trader having privilege of Parliament be made bankrupt? and if so, state the course of procedure.

53. Is it necessary in order to support an adjudication in bankruptcy against partners that each partner should commit an act of bankruptcy?

54. When and how can an adjudication of bankruptcy be disputed?

55. State when and how creditors' assignees are chosen and appointed.

56. State the mode of making a joint stock commercial or trading company, such as an insurance or banking company, (7th & 8th Vict. c. 111) bankrupt.

LAW FIRE INSURANCE SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders of this society was held on the 28th May, 1861, at the society's new offices, Chancery-lane, London. The directors, by their report, stated that the sum insured in the year 1860 was £24,236,641, in the year 1859, £22,663,913—being an increase in the year 1860 of £1,572,728; that the premiums received in the year 1860 amounted to £27,346, in the year 1859 to £25,687—being an increase in the year 1860 of £1,659; that the aggregate amount of duty paid to Government in the year 1860 was £35,938, in the year 1859, £33,919—showing an increase in the year 1860 of £2,019; that the excess of receipt over expenditure for the year 1860 was £13,728 5s. 11d. in favour of the society. Interest for the past year of 2s. 6d. upon each share, being 5 per cent. upon the paid-up capital of the society, and a bonus of 2s. 6d. upon each share, making together 5s. per share or 10 per cent. upon the paid-up capital of the society, were declared, leaving a surplus of £1,228 5s. 11d. in favour of the society. The interest and bonus will be paid on July 15 next, and on any subsequent day (except Saturday), between 11 and 3 o'clock.

PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held on the 4th inst. a dividend at the rate of 3½ per cent. was declared for the half-year ending the 31st of March last, free from income-tax, payable on the 24th inst.

PRACTICAL QUESTIONS IN CONVEYANCING.

The following questions and answers have been forwarded to us for insertion, by an eminent conveyancer:—

1. When a purchaser has a wife to whom he was married since 2nd January, 1834, why should a declaration to bar her of dower not be inserted in the conveyance?

Answer.—Because in such a case, a purchaser, without the declaration, may dispose of or charge the premises free from dower by deed, will, or a mere agreement in writing, so that the declaration, if inserted, can only operate in case he dies intestate and without making any disposition in his lifetime, and then, if the heir be a child, it is not unjust that the widow should, as against him, have one-third during her life, and if the heir be a collateral relative, the widow has clearly a superior claim.

2. When tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge, why should a vendor furnish an abstract of the award of apportionment?

Answer.—Because a tithe-rent is in the nature of a special charge. A land-owner has the power to have the whole of the rent to be paid by him, charged upon a part only of his property, to the exoneration of the rest; so that a purchaser cannot say to what rent the premises may be subject.

PRESENTATION OF A TESTIMONIAL TO H. WELLINGTON VALLANCE, ESQ., SOLICITOR.—On Tuesday evening, the 4th inst., a banquet was given at the Bridge House Hotel, to Henry Wellington Vallance, Esq., the late Deputy-Governor of the Irish Society, when the magnificent testimonial voted by the society in February last, in recognition of the valuable services rendered by that gentleman, was presented to him by the Governor, Mr. Alderman Humphrey, who presided on the occasion. The testimonial consists of a centre ornament and dessert service designed in a rich Italian style, and surmounted by delicate engraved glass tazzas for flowers and fruits. The base of the centre ornament is decorated with rich festoons of shamrock; upon it is a very beautifully modelled female figure representing Hibernia, draped in the antique style, leaning upon an ancient Royal Irish harp, grouped with emblems of agriculture and civic insignia—the figure supports the centre tazza and three very graceful pendant flower glasses. Upon three divisions of the base of the centrepiece are the inscription, a fac-simile seal of the society, and Mr. Vallance's armorial bearings. The four dessert-stands correspond with the centre ornament in the bases, and upon each is a figure of an infant river god reposing on an amphora, surrounded by aquatic plants. The whole of the memorial is illustrative of the society and the object of presentation. The inscription is as follows:—

Presented.

(On the 5th day of February, A.D. 1861,
By the Court of the Governor and Assistants, London, of the New Plantation in Ulster, within the Realm of Ireland, to HENRY WELLINGTON VALLANCE, ESQ.,
THE DEPUTY-GOVERNOR,

As a public memorial of the distinguished services rendered by him in conducting to a successful issue important negotiations with the Crown, the Corporation of Londonderry, the Port and Harbour, and Bridge Commissioners of that city, and the local railway companies, whereby the honour and influence of the Irish Society, and the substantial interests of Derry and the surrounding locality, have been materially advanced.

This testimonial also records the unanimous vote of thanks of the society to Mr. Vallance for the zealous, able, and uniformly courteous manner in which he discharged all the important functions of the office of Deputy-Governor during an unusually eventful year.

On the withdrawal of the cloth, the customary loyal toasts were given.

The Chairman, Mr. Alderman HUMPHREY, in proposing "The health of the guests of the evening," remarked that they had assembled to do honour to Mr. Vallance for the great zeal he had displayed, the time he had devoted, the energy he had brought to bear, in his office of Deputy-Governor, during the preceding year. He had entered heart and soul into the work, and not only had he performed the ordinary duties of the office of Deputy-Governor with ability, punctuality, and zeal, but had also brought to bear his professional talents, as a member of the legal profession, and his great zeal and acumen had been exercised to the great benefit of the society, and to the utmost credit to himself. It was in consideration of the eminent services of Mr. Vallance that the society had unanimously resolved to present to him the handsome testimonial which he (the Chairman) then begged to hand to him.

Mr. VALLANCE feelingly, and in very appropriate terms, acknowledged the gift.

Several other toasts were given and responded to, and the company broke up, after having spent a most pleasant evening.

It is rumoured that in pursuance of the statute under which Mr. James is seeking to arrange with his creditors, a meeting was held on the 5th inst., at which the proposal made by that gentleman for the ultimate discharge of his liabilities was unanimously agreed to by those present.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without the risk of co-partnership.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are given as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,947 10	£6,947 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1859, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

ENGLISH LAW OF DOMICIL;

Being a consideration of the view which our law takes of a subject that has, of late, become of almost national importance, not only by reason of the condition of the law itself with reference to it, but the numerous and singular cases turning upon the question that have occurred. Every one of the authorities in any degree bearing upon it, down to the date of publication, are either referred to or observed upon; including not only all the cases to be found in the decisions of the Court of Session of Scotland, but in the American Reports, with several that have taken place upon the Continent.

To which is added a brief notice of the Bill now before Parliament to amend the law with respect to wills of personal estate of British subjects.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £3,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

G. F. Heneage, Esq. £10 10 0 | Mrs. E. C., add £50 0 0

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds; a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

Dr. Golding 10 10 0	Dr. Golding 2 0 0
J. Greenwood, Esq. 5 5 0	J. Wilkinson, Esq. 5 5 0

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds, to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

Thomas Raymond Barker, Esq., add., £25, making up £100 0 0	The Rev. A. Clissold £50 0
	Messrs. Gale & Co. add. 5 5
	Messrs. Cox & Co. 100 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers.

CURRENT TOPICS.

In the House of Lords, on Monday evening, the Lord Chancellor announced the acceptance by the Government of the amendments introduced into the Bankruptcy Bill by the Select Committee. Lord Chelmsford moved and carried the insertion of a clause intended for the protection of non-traders against the retrospective operation of the Bill. He contended that, although it might be fair to give notice to the non-trader that if he incurred debts in future he must be prepared for certain consequences, yet it would be unjust to attach to existing debts consequences which made no part of the original contract, and were never contemplated by either party to it. He referred, in illustration of his argument, to the clause in the Bill empowering the Court of Bankruptcy, if a person should have contracted debts without any reasonable expectation of paying them, to commit him to prison for a year. There were, at the present moment, many persons who had thus contracted debts, and no doubt such persons were guilty of a serious moral offence, but they were not legally responsible for it as a crime. It might be quite right to make this a crime hereafter; but it could not be right to inflict punishment for an act which, when committed, was not a crime. Lord Chelmsford stated that, when the Bill was brought into the House of Commons, it contained a clause similar to that which he now proposed. The Lord Chancellor opposed the insertion of this clause, arguing that inasmuch as a non-trader could only become bankrupt and liable to imprisonment in respect of an act of bankruptcy committed by him after the passing of the Bill, the action of the Bill could not properly be said to be retrospective. The clause was carried against the Government by a majority of more than three to two. The Lord Chancellor lamented the rejection of the provisions relating to the chief judge, while Lord Brougham declared his opinion that such a functionary would be almost useless. He, however, recommended a tribunal of appeal to be composed of three commissioners, on the model of the Court of Review established in 1831. It is not easy to see how the abolition of that Court can furnish a proof of its utility, nor why the expectation that there will not be work enough for one judge of appeal should be made a reason for appointing three.

It will be remembered that at the last assizes the prosecution against Mr. Charlesworth, for alleged bribery at Wakefield, broke down through the refusal of a material witness to give his evidence. Mr. Justice Hill, instead of directing an acquittal, discharged the jury, leaving the defendant liable to be again put upon his trial. The Court of Queen's Bench allowed the defendant to file a plea setting forth the facts which occurred at the trial, so as to raise the question as to the legality of the course pursued by the judge. The Court, at the same time, gave leave to the Crown to move to take this plea off the file. The Crown having moved accordingly, the Court held that the plea in question could not be pleaded along with a plea of not guilty, and that the proper course was for the defendant to have the facts entered on the record, and then to take what advantage he could of them. The plea, therefore, was taken off the file. On a subsequent day, the record having been made up, the defendant's counsel moved for a rule to show cause why he should not be discharged from further proceedings on the information on the ground that in a criminal case the judge has not in general any power to discharge the jury after evidence has been given, until they have delivered their verdict. The Court granted a rule nisi, which will be argued at the sittings after term. The question is of great importance; for the assumption of such a power by the judge, however convenient and even desirable to prevent a defeat of justice, is not, even in the nineteenth century, to be viewed without extreme jealousy.

A correspondent has favoured us with some advertisements which he has extracted from the Morning Chronicle. Here is one of them.

TO ALL IN DEBT OR DIFFICULTIES.—

MR. PEARSALL, Qualified Attorney-at-Law, and Solicitor of all the Courts (established 1837), procures immediate protection for person and property (in town or country), and entire relief from all debts and liabilities, under the recent Acts of Parliament, without imprisonment or publicity. Charges very moderate, payable by instalments. Advice confidential and without charge. References given. Imprisoned debtors released. All legal business transacted, including that of the County, Police, Probate, and Divorce Courts. — Offices, 9, Charing-cross, London.

Mr. Pearsall's statement "established 1837" would appear to mean, if it has any meaning, that he has carried on business uninterruptedly since that year, at the address given in the advertisement. But on turning, by way of test, to the Law List for 1858, we do not find Mr. Pearsall's name in it at all. We do not care to pursue the investigation further, feeling tolerably confident that Mr. Pearsall is alive to the danger of incurring penalties for unqualified practice, although insensible to the difference between a liberal profession and a chandler's shop. We certainly were not aware of the recent Acts of Parliament under which "entire relief from all debts and liabilities" might be so easily procured. It is melancholy, although not surprising, to see this class of low practitioners advertising their readiness to do business in the Divorce Court. Their interference between man and wife is a much more serious evil than the most active and unsparing use which they can make of the machinery for extortion provided for them in the County Courts. The mischief which they can do in the one case is measured by a few pounds, whereas in the other, the honour and happiness of families may be destroyed by their pestilent activity.

Here is another of these curious advertisements, all of which seem to prefer the partial obscurity of a penny newspaper:—

AW COSTS SAFELY AVOIDED.—The Under- signed, of many years practical experience, offers to RECOVER DEBTS in town and country, and to transact all legal business FREE from BILLS of COSTS ALTOGETHER, for a small Annual Fee, or a Commission of Five per Cent. Divorce cases conducted. Bankruptcies, Insolvencies, &c., &c. REFERENCES TO CLIENTS.

Apply personally or by letter to Mr. WETHERFIELD, Solicitor, 17, Devonshire-square, Bishopsgate.—Mortgages obtained. No charge unless money advanced. Life Insurances effected GRATIS.

Of course, the advertiser conducts divorce cases, but he omits to add the word "discreetly," which we find in another of his advertisements. An unlearned reader might suppose that "bankruptcies, insolvencies, &c.,

&c.," were articles of which, as other tradesmen say, "a large stock is kept constantly on hand." Another advertisement is addressed to those who have long struggled against the force of misfortune, in ignorance of the beneficent provisions of certain Acts of Parliament. Here the style is exactly imitated from another class of advertisements which inform us how many are the victims of dyspepsia, and how few of them are aware of the virtues of the Digestive Pills. We are desired to read a work called "Protection without imprisonment," just as we have been often, but in vain, invited to the consideration of some simple means of attaining health, happiness, and longevity. It is difficult to say which is the greater social pest, a quack doctor or a low practitioner in the courts.

THE KOSSUTH NOTE CASE.

Impartial observers will have anticipated the conclusion arrived at by the Full Court of Appeal to sustain the injunction in this case. It is possible that the counsel and solicitor engaged in it for the defendants may have forgotten, in their professional enthusiasm, that it does not follow that a judge's decision is unsound because the reasons which he gives for it are untenable. The surprise felt by us at the judgment delivered by Vice-Chancellor Stuart would have been equalled by the surprise which we should have felt if that judgment had been overruled. The Vice-Chancellor appears to have granted the injunction as a protection to the prerogative rights of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary; and he laid the principal stress upon the allegation in the bill that the notes were intended to be used in Hungary in violation of the rights and prerogatives of the plaintiff as king of that country, for the promotion of revolution and disorder there. The notes were said by the Vice-Chancellor to differ from warlike weapons only in this—that warlike weapons might be used for lawful purposes, whereas the notes could only be used in hostility to the rights of the King of Hungary. The inference from this observation appeared to be that if it could be proved that warlike weapons had been prepared in this country for the express purpose of invading the Austrian dominions, the Court of Chancery would grant an injunction against such use of them, and would order the weapons to be destroyed. Of course, as soon as this inference is stated, it is seen to be destructive of the argument from which it is deduced. It was admitted by the plaintiff's counsel, in arguing the appeal, that the Court of Chancery has nothing to do with preventing revolutions or with the protection of the prerogatives of foreign sovereigns, and that its interference could only be invoked to prevent an injury to property. The Lord Chancellor very anxiously disclaimed the assumption of any such sweeping jurisdiction as has been sometimes attributed to his court. He rested his decision in the present case upon the principle that "the Court has jurisdiction by injunction to protect property from an act threatened, which, if completed, would give a right of action." There can be no possible dispute about the soundness of this principle; and the only question is whether it could be made to apply to the present case. Certainly, we may concede that the injury to what we will, for the moment, call the property of the King of Hungary by the issue of the notes would be likely to be so great that an action for damages would afford no adequate redress. The preliminary question, however, is whether an action for an injury to property may be brought by a foreign sovereign in an English court. The Lord Chancellor is clearly of opinion that such an action would be maintainable. If the Bank of Austria were actually damaged by the importation from England into Hungary of spurious notes intended to discredit the notes of the Bank of Austria, the Lord Chancellor considered that the Bank of Austria might maintain an action in England against the wrong-doers.

"If the Bank of Austria might, why might not the King of Hungary, on proof that, by the same wrong, a pecuniary damage had been sustained by him?" We think that in this question of the Lord Chancellor is comprised all the difficulty of the case. It is, to say the least, a view of the effect of the issue of the Kossuth notes which would occur to very few minds to assert that such issue would be likely to cause pecuniary damage to the King of Hungary. The Lord Chancellor referred, in illustration of another topic, to the celebrated invasion of France by its present Emperor, which is an example of a kind of injury to a foreign sovereign, of which the preparation could not have been restrained by the injunction of the Court of Chancery. It might certainly be said, taking a limited and special view of the possible effect of that invasion, that it would have been likely, if successful, to cause pecuniary damage to King Louis Philippe; and the observation would be just, although, perhaps, irrelevant, that that sovereign was peculiarly sensitive to injury of this description. It is plain to common understandings that M. Kossuth intended first to revolutionize Hungary, and then to issue to its people the new paper-money which had been prepared for the occasion by Messrs. Day. Whenever Hungary is revolutionized, the Emperor of Austria will have lost a noble kingdom. To say that he will have incurred some pecuniary damage, is like the bewildered landlord in one of Mr. Dickens's tales saying, when his house has been sacked by rioters, that he thinks there is a trifle of broken glass. But the Lord Chancellor proceeded on the ground of possible pecuniary damage, not only to the King of Hungary, but to his subjects, whom he had a right to represent in an English court of justice. Whether when the revolution shall be—if it is to be—accomplished, and M. Kossuth becomes—if he should become—the president of an Hungarian republic, the enjoyment of liberty, and the blessings of M. Kossuth's administration, will or will not compensate the Hungarian people for any disturbance of the circulating medium, is a question which may be answered differently, according to the estimate which is formed of the comparative advantages of freedom and of tranquillity. We should think that, supposing M. Kossuth to have travelled safely into Hungary with twenty-three tons of potential paper-money among his baggage, and to have got himself installed quietly as president, it really would not be at all difficult to substitute his notes for those which are now in use without inflicting loss upon the holders. If, indeed, it should be said that M. Kossuth would perhaps repudiate the existing circulation, and so cause pecuniary damage to all Hungarians in whose hands notes might happen to be, we should answer that the damage thus occasioned would be attributable to the act of repudiation, and not to the preparation or issue of the new notes. Supposing M. Kossuth to have ousted the King of Hungary, this notion of pecuniary damage to that King, or to his late subjects, cognizable in an English court, seems to us a mere unsubstantial figment of judicial subtlety. Supposing again that M. Kossuth cannot oust the King, it appears to us a violent supposition to imagine that either that King or any of his subjects can suffer pecuniary damage through attempts at circulating pretended notes under the eyes of a police who are in general neither blind nor lenient. If an Hungarian subject should be found with a note of M. Kossuth in his pocket, it is very likely that he might be imprisoned or shot, and might also incur forfeiture of his property. In a certain sense it might be said that the note had caused that pecuniary damage which is one of the usual consequences of a political prosecution, but it is not by speaking in such a sense that difficult legal discussions are likely to be brought to any satisfactory point.

There appears to be no doubt that the defendants might have been successfully indicted for a misdemeanour. But the plaintiff's advisers judged, as it turns out, rightly that the Court of Chancery would be disposed, if possible, to find reasons to justify it in granting an injunction, of which the effect, although not the intention, is to restrain the commission of what, we apprehend, is, in the view of the English law, a crime. We have the authority of Lord Eldon for asserting that the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction to prevent the commission of a crime, and Lord Campbell has closed the door which Vice-Chancellor Stuart's judgment seemed to open by the declaration that the Court does not interfere to prevent revolution in foreign countries, or to protect what are somewhat vaguely called the "prerogative rights" of foreign sovereigns. Lord Eldon has laid down that a bill for an injunction must state "facts of which the Court can take notice, as a case of civil property which it is bound to protect." The Full Court of Appeal has found such a statement in the bill before it, and therefore the injunction is sustained with the slight exception that M. Kossuth is at liberty to make what use he pleases of the royal arms of Hungary, provided, of course, that he pays the tax which our law imposes upon those who indulge in such a luxury.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. IV.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

Of the Rights and Remedies of Aliens.

It appears to me that there is a strong analogy between the cases upon the property of an alien friend in the copyright of his work first published in this country, and those upon his right to protection in the use of a trade-mark; and I think it will be admitted that the only true distinction arises from the fact that the former right must be now held (whatever may formerly have been the judicial opinion on the subject) to exist solely by virtue of the statute 8 Anne, c. 19, whereas the latter is, as I have before pointed out, a common-law right.

The latest, and, perhaps, most important case on the subject of copyright in a foreigner residing abroad, is that of Jeffreys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. 815. In that case there seems to have been a very strong opinion that, independently of the statute of 8 Anne, an author had even after publication an exclusive right in his manuscript by virtue of the Common Law. At any rate, from the opinions of the six judges, who in that case pronounced in favour of the right of a foreigner residing abroad and publishing his manuscript in this country first, to the privileges of a British subject in respect of his copyright (for the circumstances of that case are equivalent to such a statement of facts) the following propositions appear to follow; that copyright for the author of a literary work existed by common law unless taken away by the statute of Queen Anne, or some succeeding statute; that property was the foundation of that right; that the author had the copyright of his work because he was the owner; and that (the statute law in their opinion not intervening to destroy that pre-existing right, but only to limit it), the author, whether a natural-born subject or a foreigner, was entitled to protection in respect of this right, which existed on our soil, and was there exposed to wrongful damage; and the cases of Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303 and Donaldson v. Beckett, 4 Burr. 2408, s. c. 2 Bro., P. C. 129, were referred to in support of these doctrines. However, since the judgment in the case now under consideration, it must, no doubt, be held that a foreigner resident abroad has no copyright in his work sent into our country to be first published, that the common law right in an unpublished manuscript is, after publication, exchanged for that given by the statute; and that in this statute, i.e. 8 Anne, c. 19, the words in the preamble to the effect that the object of the Act was the "encouragement of learned men to compose and write useful books," and the words in the enacting clause "that the author of any book" should have the sole liberty of printing and reprinting it, were to be taken to comprehend such learned men and authors only as were at the time of publication, for it is, no doubt, at that moment that the statutory right begins, actually resident in this kingdom. The dictum of the Vice-Chancellor in De-londre v. Shaw, 2 Sim. 237 (the earliest case in which a foreigner attempted to obtain the protection of a Court of Equity in the use of a trade-mark), "that the Court does not protect the copyright of a foreigner," accords with this view, although his Honour, in a later case (Bentley v. Foster 10 Sim. 329), expressed a directly opposite opinion.

With regard, however, to the right of an alien friend to be protected in the use of his trade-mark the cases of the Collins Company (Collins Co. v. Brown, 3 K. & J. 423; Collins Company v. Cowen, Id. 428.) place the question beyond a doubt, wherever the infringement of that right is attempted by persons within the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country. The Collins Company were edge-tool manufacturers in the United States, and had long used certain stamps and labels to distinguish their tools, and they charged the defendants in the respective suits (for both bills were in substance the same) with having fraudulently used and imitated their trade-mark and label, and with selling articles of their own manufacture in large quantities to various persons in England and elsewhere, marked and labelled like the goods of the plaintiffs, for the purpose of passing them off as being such goods; and the bills charged the loss already, and which would be hereafter, suffered by the plaintiffs by a continuance of this practice on the part of the defendants, and prayed for an account of their profits on such fraudulent sales,—the delivery up of all stamps and labels imitating those of the plaintiffs,—and an injunction to restrain them from the use of such stamps and labels in future.

It was contended in support of a demurrer in the first of these suits (Collins Co. v. Brown, sup.) that the plaintiffs being an American company, without an establishment in this country, and having never, even according to their own allegations, manufactured or sold goods here, had no right to a trade-mark in England; that they could not be defrauded by the use of their trade-mark by another person in England; and that in their own country they might sue any person who there sold goods so as to interfere with their trade. It was urged that as in cases of foreign copyright, so in this case, the foreign right gave no similar right in this country; and that a patent taken out in America might be infringed in this country without redress, and the same rule must extend to using trade-marks; and it was urged that there would be great inconvenience to traders in this country who might, if suits of such a nature were allowed, be vexatiously charged with violations of rights of which they perhaps were utterly ignorant. In either case however the demurrer was disallowed on the ground that the right to sue in such cases was a personal right, and that being so, a party injured in respect of such right might obtain a remedy against the wrong-doer in the country where he resided, wherever the injury might have been done. In the words of the judgment in this case, "the simple question is, has the plaintiff, by the appropriation of a particular mark, fixed in the market where his goods are sold a conviction that the goods so marked were made by him; and if so, and if no one else had been in the habit of using that mark, another man has not the right to use that mark so as to commit the fraudulent act of palming off his own goods as being the goods of the person who is known to have been in the habit of using it:" that fraud "is the true foundation of jurisdiction in these cases; and if a man has been in the habit of using a particular mark for his goods for a long time, during which no one else has used a similar mark, the adoption of the same mark by another can only be with a fraudulent intent; and any fraud may be redressed in the country in which it is committed, whatever may be the country of the person who has been defrauded."

Nearly the same arguments were advanced in the second case (Collins Comp. v. Cowen, sup.) in support of the defendant's demurrer; and it was further urged that the defendants had obtained by user the right to this trade-mark in England. It was also urged that there was nothing to show that by the law of America the acts complained of were such as the courts there would restrain. It was, however, said by V.C. Wood that it was no question of acquiring the trade-mark, that no person could acquire property in a trade-mark; what was to be inquired was, whether the defendants had acquired a right to put the names and addresses of the plaintiffs and the trade-mark of the plaintiffs on their goods for the purpose of selling them as being the work and manufacture of the plaintiffs. And it was said that the doing of this was a fraud in respect of which the subject of every country not being an alien enemy (and even to an alien enemy the Court has extended relief in some cases of fraud) would have a right to apply to the Court to have the injury to his property arrested. This latter expression, to my mind, contains the whole ground for the decisions of the Courts of Equity upon cases of the violation of trade-marks, and for the distinction, when the rights of an alien not here resident are concerned, between these cases and those of copyright. In the latter case, there is a specific property created by statute—a property of such a nature (according to the case of Jeffreys v. Boosey, sup.) that it cannot subsist in a foreigner resident abroad; in cases of the former class there is a right, existing by virtue of common law, to have an injury against property of a certain species restrained, the property being not in the mere mark or name, but in the preference in a particular market for the sale of particular goods, or in the words of Lord Cranworth in Farina v. Silverlock, 6 De G. M. & G. 214, "it is a right which can be said to exist only and can be tested only by its violation; it is the right which any person designating his wares or commodities by a particular trade-mark, as it is called, has to prevent others from selling wares which are not his, marked with that trade-mark, in order to mislead the public, and so incidentally to injure the person who is owner of the trade-mark." This right, it is now clear, is recognised by our Courts to exist for an alien as well as for a subject of this country; for I think that the case of Pisani v. Lawson, 6 Bing. N. C. 90, shows that at law as well as in equity an alien friend, not resident at any time in this country, may maintain a personal action for an injury done within the realm.

In the cases of Delondre v. Shaw and Farina v. Silverlock, to which I have before alluded, the decision was not grounded on the nationality of the plaintiff in either case; they contain particular points of interest on which I shall hereafter observe; the whole law relating to the rights of foreigners is contained in the Collins Company cases to which I have referred; they were followed by the case of Collins Company v. Reeves, 6 W. R. 117, where, the defendant's answer tending to throw some doubt on the title to the trade-mark, the plaintiffs' bill was retained for a year, with liberty to them to bring an action-at-law, and Collins Company v. Walker, 7 W. R. 222, decided in favour of the plaintiff. In neither of these cases, however, was the right of a foreigner to sue in respect of an injury to his property in a trade-mark denied; that injury having been committed in this country.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed D. D. Heath, Esq., the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court, and J. B. Dacent, Esq., the judge of the Shoreditch and Bow County Courts, to be members of the Committee of County Court Judges, under the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, in the places of John Herbert Koe, Esq., Q.C., deceased, and Edward Cooke, Esq., resigned.

BAIL COURT.

(Sittings in Banco, before Mr. Justice HILL.)

Ex parte Poole.—In this case application was made on behalf of Mr. Poole, an attorney, for a rule to call upon an attorney named Alfred Haines to show why a criminal information should not be filed against him in consequence of his having written the following letter to Mr. Poole:—"Sir,—Having reasons, which I do not feel called upon to detail, but which your own conscience will dictate as a justification to me, I have to desire that all intercourse between our respective families may cease, as it is quite impossible I can allow any member of my family to associate with any one so regardless of principle and truth as yourself.—Yours, A. HAINES"

In reply Mr. Poole wrote the following letter to Mr. Haines:—"Sir,—It is my intention to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information against you for a libellous accusation against me contained in your letter, but before I do so I am desirous to afford you an opportunity of withdrawing the gross charge and expressing your regret for having made it. I feel I should not be worthy of the respect of my professional brethren and the public if I suffered such a stigma to rest on my character. As term expires on the 12th I shall expect to receive a withdrawal and apology in writing before Thursday.—Yours, &c., POOLE."

Mr. Poole stated in his affidavit that he had not received the withdrawal, and he denied that there was any ground for the imputation.

Mr. Justice HILL having asked if that was the whole case, and it being stated that it was, said that there was no sufficient ground for the interference of this Court.

Rule refused.

Wednesday being the last day of Trinity Term, the Court of Chancery rose, and will not sit again till Thursday, June 20, when the sittings after Trinity Term commence.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Germain Lavis, Esq., student of Christ Church, Oxford, to the vacant clerkship in the office of the Registrars of the Court of Chancery.

J. R. Bulwer, Esq., of the Norfolk Circuit, has been appointed to the recordership of Ipswich, rendered vacant by the resignation of David Power, Esq., Q.C.

Robert Ashby Reeve, Esq., of Woodbridge, Suffolk, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

George Appleby Jenkins, Esq., of Penryn, Cornwall, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 10.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The House having resolved itself into committee on this Bill, The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he did not intend to propose the rejection of the amendments introduced into the Bill by the select committee.

The first 126 clauses were agreed to without observation.

Lord CHELMSFORD then said that he had given notice of a new clause which he wished to ask their lordships to introduce in the Bill. He had endeavoured to persuade the select committee to introduce the clause he was now about to submit to their lordships, but he was defeated by a narrow majority. He would have followed the example of his noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, and have bowed to the decision of the committee, if he had not felt that a most important principle was at stake. By this Bill, for the first time, non-traders were to be made liable to the bankruptcy law. Many persons whose opinions were entitled to the highest respect doubted the policy and expediency of that change in the law, and were inclined to believe that it would lead to mischievous consequences. When objections had been raised to that proposal on former occasions, his noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor had met them by referring to the case of Scotland, where, he said, there was no distinction made between traders and non-traders. But with submission, it appeared to him (Lord Chelmsford) that where a person had been born under a particular system of law, he had been able to accommodate himself, his habits and feelings, to that system; but the case was wholly different when, for the first time, a new law was introduced which unsettled established ideas, and placed debtors and creditors upon entirely new relations towards each other. He had no objection to the blending of the systems of bankruptcy and insolvency. He called it "blending," because he thought it was a mistake to say that they were about to abolish the distinction between the non-trader and the trader, and which he believed could never be done, the position of the two classes being so different, and their relations with their creditors so dissimilar. It would be fair to say to a non-trader, "If you incur debts in future, you must be prepared for certain consequences;" but it would be most unjust to say that existing debts and liabilities should have consequences attaching to them which made no part of the original contract, and were never contemplated by either party. It was a remarkable circumstance that when this Bill was brought into the House of Commons it contained a clause of precisely the same description as that which he was now asking their lordships to adopt. Let them ransack the statute-book and they would find there no instances in which persons had been subjected to civil liabilities, much less to punishment, by retrospective legislation. He, therefore, begged to move the insertion of the clause which he had described.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that with regard to the amendment moved by his noble and learned friend, he must acknowledge that it would be by no means fatal to the Bill. It would only delay its operation in a few cases. He agreed with what his noble and learned friend had said against retrospective legislation; but he denied that this could fairly be considered a retrospective law. The object was not to punish debtors, but to provide that they should cede their property for division among their creditors. There was nothing in the Bill which would subject a debtor to punishment for anything hitherto done. It was only in respect of what might be done hereafter that an adjudication of bankruptcy could take place. It was the going abroad with intent to delay creditors—it was the staying abroad with intent to defraud creditors—it was the making a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of property with the same intent—it was only where these acts were done after the Bill had received the royal assent that the debtor committing them could be made a bankrupt. He maintained this was prospective, not retrospective legislation. It was necessary, and he believed it would be salutary. He trusted their lordships would agree with the House of Commons and the select committee, and negative the motion of his noble and learned friend.

The Earl of DERBY said, the statement of the noble and learned lord that there was nothing either retrospective or penal in the Bill was one in which he could not concur. Clause 82 was decidedly retrospective in its character, because it rendered non-traders liable in certain circumstances to be made bankrupts in respect of debts incurred prior to the passing of the Act; while clause 164 was as decidedly penal, because it empowered the Court, if it should be of opinion that the bankrupt, whether trader or non-trader, had not at the time when any of his debts were contracted any reasonable or probable expectation of being able to pay the same, to sentence him to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding one year. The Bill, in fact, was both retrospective and penal, and on that ground he supported the amendment.

LORD CHANWORTH supported the Bill, and hoped their lordships would not disturb the decision of the select committee.

LORD BROUGHAM was in favour of the amendment.

LORD WENSLYDALE objected to the proposed clause.

Their lordships then divided on the question "That this clause be here inserted." The numbers were,

Majority against the Government ... 37

The clause, with some verbal amendments, was then agreed to.

LORD CHANWORTH moved as an amendment that clause G, introduced by the select committee relating to the sale of the reversionary interests of bankrupts, be struck out, but the amendment was negatived after some conversation, and the clause agreed to.

The remaining clauses were then agreed to with one or two verbal amendments, and the House resumed.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The Lord Chancellor gave notice that on bringing up the report on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill he should move that clause 208, with amendments, be restored to the Bill.

Thursday, June 13.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The report of amendments was brought up.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, several verbal amendments were made, and the Bill was ordered to be re-printed and read a third time on Tuesday next.

WILLS OF PERSONALTY BY BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

This Bill was read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 11.

The following Bills for the reform of the criminal law passed through committee, viz:—Offences against the Person Bill; Larceny, &c., Bill; Malicious Injuries to Property Bill; Forgery Bill; Coining Offences Bill; Accessories and Abettors Bill.

CRIMINAL STATUTES REPEAL BILL.

This Bill also passed through committee.

DISTRICT REGISTRARS OF THE COURT OF PROBATE.

EARL JERMYN asked the Secretary to the Treasury on what basis the salaries of district registrars, appointed under the Probate Act of 1857, and hitherto paid by fees, had been calculated, and whether he would have any objection to laying any Treasury document which there might be, explanatory of such calculation, on the table of the House?

MR. F. PEEL said, the basis on which the Treasury had proceeded was, the number of grants in the different districts of the registrars for each of the last three years, also the emoluments of the officers in those years, the relative importance of the places in which these registrars were situated, and the amount of probate duty paid into the Treasury. There were no documents connected with the matter except the Treasury minute, which was already before the House.

THE CASE OF MR. BARBER.

DR. BRADY moved a resolution that the claims of Mr. Barber upon the favourable consideration of the Crown, referred to in the report of the select committee of July, 1858, have not been satisfied; and that the circumstances set forth in his petition of the 2nd of May are entitled to the consideration of the Government. He stated the case of Mr. Barber, who had received what he termed the paltry sum of £5,000, and he asked in addition the moderate sum of £3,700.

SIR G. GREY opposed the motion. The late Government, he observed, had recommended to Parliament (though there was no precedent for such a course) to grant to Mr. Barber what many thought the generous and liberal compensation of £5,000, a recommendation which was not acceded to by the House without some opposition. Mr. Barber now asked for a further sum, and if this was granted he might come again.

SIR F. KELLY strongly advocated the claim of Mr. Barber.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said the question involved a very important principle, whether, in all cases where a person, not legally guilty of a crime, was nevertheless erroneously convicted, he would be entitled to a pecuniary compensation from the public exchequer.

The motion was, upon its merits, opposed by Mr. LONGFIELD and supported by Mr. MAGUIRE.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT objected to the motion on principle.

MR. MALINS insisted that Mr. Barber was entitled to be treated as a perfectly innocent man; but could not be a party to re-opening the question.

The motion was negatived.

Wednesday, June 12.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH RELIEF BILL.

MR. LOCKE moved that the House go into committee on this Bill.

MR. M'MAHON said there was a great difference between permitting the substitution of an oath for a declaration in civil and criminal proceedings. In civil cases it was known what witnesses were to be called, and their character could be inquired into. But in the administration of the criminal law, where the lower classes were usually concerned, it would not be safe to dispense with the sanction of an oath. It would be better to get rid of oaths altogether.

Mr. LOCKE said that the Bill proposed to enact in this country what was already the law in Ireland. There was this difference between the present Bill and the Affirmations Bill, that the present measure required that the person making a declaration in lieu of an oath should have a religious belief, while the Affirmations Bill required no religious belief in the person making the declaration.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that his objection to the Bill was not one of principle, but rather of degree. Those who had had experience in our criminal courts must be convinced that there were thousands who were prepared to tell a lie who yet shrank from committing the offence of perjury. He believed that the Bill was uncalled-for, and would be dangerous in its operation.

Sir H. CAIRNS held it to be a mistake and a fallacy to contend that rules in regard to oaths that might be adopted in civil suits were equally suitable for criminal proceedings. In civil cases the defendant might be examined on oath. Was the hon. and learned member for Southwark prepared to examine the prisoner in criminal cases on oath likewise?

Mr. CRAUFURD must remind the Solicitor-General that this was, and had been for some time, the law in Ireland. If the hon. and learned gentleman had such strong objections to the Bill, why did he not bring in a measure to repeal the Irish Act?

A quarter to 6 o'clock having arrived, the SPEAKER interposed, and stopped the debate.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS (IRELAND).

Leave was given to Sir H. CAIRNS to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to attorneys and solicitors in Ireland, by extending to them the provisions of the English Act of last session.

The Bill was read a first time.

BANKRUPT'S ORDER AND DISPOSITION.

North v. Gurney, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 678.

The question in this case was one of some nicety. A firm of coal merchants had entered into a contract with the Admiralty for supplying coal to British stations in West Africa. The coal was to be consigned to the officers of Government, and bills of lading in triplicate were to be delivered to the Admiralty. On the arrival of the coal at its destination a certificate of the due delivery was to be given to the contractors. On the production of this certificate to the Admiralty bills were to be issued for the amount. The contractors borrowed money to enable them to fulfil their contract, and by way of security they deposited a fourth part of each of the bills of lading and the policies of insurance effected on the coal; and they also gave a promissory note and a memorandum by which "in default of due payment of the note at maturity, or when called upon to do so, they engaged to make the necessary arrangements with the Admiralty to enable the lenders to receive the value of the cargoes from them." Several vessels had been laden and despatched. One had delivered her cargo, and the others were still at sea, or had just arrived, when the contractors became bankrupt. After the bankruptcy, and with knowledge of it, the lenders, for the first time, gave notice to the Admiralty of the assignment to them. The assignees in bankruptcy claimed the money payable by the Admiralty, on the ground that the benefit of this contract was a chose in action which had been left in the order and disposition of the bankrupts for want of notice of the assignment, and therefore passed to the assignees in bankruptcy under sect. 125 of the Bankrupt Act. It was ingeniously argued for the lenders that the deposit of the bills of lading and the accompanying memorandum constituted an equitable assignment of the coals, which were then at sea; and authorities were cited to establish that in such a case goods could not be said to be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner, because there could be no opportunity for such true owner to take possession of the goods. The case principally relied on to support this argument was that of Burn v. Carvalho (4 My. & Cr. 690). In that case A., having goods in the hands of B. as his agent at a foreign port, and being under liabilities to C., by letter to C. promised that he would direct, and by a subsequent letter to B. did direct, B. to deliver over the goods to D. as the agent of C. at that port. Before the delivery of the goods a commission of bankruptcy issued against A. under an act of bankruptcy committed while his letter was on its way to B., and the goods were delivered by B. to D. in ignorance of the bankruptcy. It was held that C. had a good title in equity to the goods. Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in his judgment, said, "It was argued that the goods in the hands of B. were in the order and disposition of A. at the time of his bankruptcy, and that they therefore passed to his assignees; but this argument is excluded by the fact that there was no possibility of informing B. of the equitable assignment before the act of bankruptcy." It was assumed in the argument of the case before us that if notice had been given to the captain of any one of the ships of the assignment, that would have made the assignment good as to the cargo of that ship; and as it was impossible to give this notice, it was contended that the assignment was equally good in equity without it. So long as the ship was at sea notice was unnecessary, because impossible; and when the ship reached her port the coal was immediately delivered to the Government; and thereupon the right of the lenders was transferred from the coal to the value of it. At that moment, therefore, and not earlier, did it become the duty of the lenders to give notice to the Admiralty that this debt had been transferred to them. The argument that notice was unnecessary so long as the goods were at sea, was further supported by the recent case of Acraman v. Bates (6 Jur. N. S. 294). In that case G., by deed dated November 11, 1857, assigned the cargo with which the ship Esturias was then laden, and which thereafter should be placed on board, to defendant for securing the balance of a banking account. On the 23rd of January, 1858, notice of the deed was sent, directed to the captain of the ship, "West Coast of Africa;" but it never reached him. At the date of the deed defendant had reason to expect that the Esturias would soon sail on her homeward voyage. In fact, she was then on the west coast of Africa, taking in and seeking cargo. In the early part of 1858 she still continued thus engaged, and from the 1st to the 11th of February she received part of the cargo of another ship belonging to the bankrupt. On the 12th of February she sailed on her homeward voyage. On the 1st of March G. was adjudicated a bankrupt. On the arrival of the Esturias on the 24th of April, the master was served with a copy of the notice. In an action by the assignees of G. to recover the proceeds of the cargo, it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the deed operated as an equitable assignment of the cargo, and that there was no distinction between the part of the cargo put on board before the assignment and the part put on board after. It was further held that there was no default in defendant in not giving notice of the deed, and therefore the goods were not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. In the present case, if the lenders' counsel had been right in the view which they took of the original transaction, it appears impossible to contend, in the face of the two authorities to which we have referred, that the lenders were bound to take any further step to assert their right until intelligence reached England of the delivery of some one or more of the cargoes, which did not occur until many weeks after the bankruptcy of the contractors. The difficulty felt by Vice-Chancellor Wood was in determining how the original transaction ought to be viewed. His conclusion, however, was that "the thing really dealt with was a chattel interest in the contract with the Admiralty." He thought it was not a right view of the contract to say that it transferred the coal. He tested the effect of this contract by considering whether the lenders could legally have diverted the coal from its destination. He considered that even if the lenders had this power by virtue of the deposit with them of the fourth part of the bills of lading, a court of equity would restrain them from exerting it. He said that the arrangement amounted to "a transfer of the benefit of the contract plus the chattels if the contract should drop through." But as the contract had been performed, the lenders' right to the chattels did not arise. Looking at the case thus, the argument which we have stated was displaced, and the counsel for the lenders were thrown back on the attempt which they had made to distinguish this from previous cases, where the rule as to order and disposition had been held to apply to future debts. It is well known that policies of assurance are within this rule, and it would make no difference if the assurance office refused to notice assignments of its policies, just as the Admiralty in the present case would probably have refused to recognise any notice of the assignment of this contract. It may, indeed, be urged that it is certain that man must die, while it is uncertain whether a ship will reach her port and discharge her cargo; and, therefore, that it is a further extension of a doctrine which the Courts do not favour to say that notice must be given of the assignment of a debt which is to arise on a contingency more doubtful than any that is to be found in decided cases. But this argument in effect, although not exactly in this form, was pressed upon the Vice-Chancellor; and it is certain to have been fully considered by a judge, who has shown very strongly in the case of Rawbone's Bequest (3 K. & J. 300, 476), his disinclination to extend the doctrine of reputed ownership. He remarked that the present case came clearly within the reason of the rule, because the contractors were left at liberty to go and raise money in some other quarter for want of the precaution which the law required to be taken by the first lenders. The decision, therefore, was in favour of the assignees.

The plaintiffs in this case had obtained an admission from the defendants that they knew of the act of bankruptcy of the contractors at the time when they gave notice to the Admiralty. The importance of this admission will be seen by reference to the case of Brewin v. Short (5 Ell. & Bl. 227), in which a judicial construction is placed upon sect. 133 of the Bankrupt Act. By that section it is enacted that all contracts, dealings, and transactions by and with any bankrupt bona fide made and entered into before the fiat or petition for adjudication shall be valid, notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy, provided the person so dealing with such bankrupt had not, at the time of such contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any prior act of bankruptcy by him committed. In the case of Brewin v. Short, A., being the true owner of goods under a bill of sale from B., permitted them to remain in the order and disposition of B., who committed an act of bankruptcy by assigning all his property for the benefit of his creditors. Possession was taken under this assignment, and a few hours later A. sent a man to take possession under his bill of sale, who was told that he was too late, as another person was in possession for all the creditors. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, upon the facts, that as A.'s man got notice of the act of bankruptcy as soon as he came to B.'s house, enough had not been done to take the goods out of the order and disposition of B. But Lord Campbell, in giving judgment, said—"If, before the fiat and after the act of bankruptcy, the defendant bona fide, and without notice of the act of bankruptcy, had done anything which, before the act of bankruptcy, would have been sufficient to determine his permission, and consent to the goods remaining in the possession, order, and disposition of the bankrupt, so as that a subsequent act of bankruptcy would not have subjected the goods to be dealt with under the clauses of the Bankrupt Act respecting reputed ownership, we should have held that his title ought to prevail, although he had not, before notice of the act of bankruptcy, succeeded in obtaining the actual possession of the goods." The Court thought that the facts before it showed only an intention to demand possession, and not an actual demand, before notice of the act of bankruptcy; and, therefore, the assignees prevailed. The language of Lord Campbell would have been strictly applicable to the case before us if the lenders had given notice to the Admiralty of the assignment before they had given notice of the act of bankruptcy, although after it was committed. They would have done something which, before the act of bankruptcy, would have been sufficient to determine their consent to the choses in action remaining in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. No doubt it is a stretch of language to say that a notice to the Admiralty is a transaction with the bankrupt within sect. 133 of the Act. But it is clear law that, in general, notice to the debtor of the assignment of a debt is equivalent to taking possession of a chattel, and Lord Campbell's words imply that these two acts are equivalent for the purpose of gaining the protection of this section. However, when the question arises it may, perhaps, call forth considerable discussion. In the present case the defendants were debarred from raising it by their own admission of notice of the act of bankruptcy.

Greenhow v. Parker, Exch., 9 W. R. 578.

The general rule of law with regard to venue is that where the cause of action is for a breach of contract, an injury to the person and the like, and might, therefore, in the nature of things have arisen anywhere (that is to say, where it is "transitory") the plaintiff may lay his venue where he pleases, subject to the right of the defendant to bring it back if he will to the county where the cause of action actually arose, upon his obtaining a judge's order to that effect; while, on the other hand, in "local" actions—that is to say, where the injury alleged is to or in respect of real property, and the locus in quo is a material part of the issue—the plaintiff must lay the venue in the county where the premises are situate, and a mistake on his part here will (unless amended in time) be fatal in arrest of judgment.

An action for penalties, although not in its nature necessarily local, has yet been placed by the legislature upon the same footing in respect of venue; for it is enacted by 31 Eliz. c. 5, s. 2, that in such proceedings the venue shall be laid in the county where the contract or other matter alleged to have been in contravention of the statute was really done; and this at peril of a nonsuit, if the defendant allege in his pleadings that the offence was not committed in the county wherein the venue is laid and succeeds at the trial on the issue thereon raised. Now in local actions (including, it is apprehended, actions for penalties) the courts have no power as they have in transitory actions to change the venue unless by consent; but the unnecessary delay and expense hereby formerly arising was remedied by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 22, which gave the courts power in local actions to order the trial to take place in some county other than that in which the venue is laid; making on the record a suggestion that the trial might be more conveniently there had than in the county in which the venue was laid.

The question in the present case was whether this last statute enabled a judge to make such order and suggestion in an action for penalties, and the Court held that he had such power. "All actions," said the Chief Baron, "are either local or transitory; this was a local action and under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, the judge at chambers is expressly empowered to change the venue."

It is submitted that though the conclusion thus come to may be sound, the reasoning on which it was grounded is not quite accurate. For, in the first place, an action for "penalties" is not a local action in the nature of things, but has only been placed by the Legislature on the same footing as a local action, with regard to venue, for the sake of convenience; and in the next place, the statute of William does not authorise a change of venue in a local action, but only an order for the trial to be had in a place where it would not otherwise have been held.

LIABILITY OF THE TREASURY TO A MANDAMUS TO PAY OVER MONEY.

Ex parte Warlmsly, Q. B., 9 W. R. 599.

This singular motion for a mandamus to the Lords of the Treasury to pay over the balance of an account for goods supplied by the applicant for the use of a county court on the order of its registrar, was grounded and derived its chief hope of success from a case reported in the 4th volume of "Adolphus & Ellis," in which a somewhat similar attempt proved, in fact, successful; and which must, at the time it took place, have considerably ruffled the pride of official life in Downing-street.

The history of this case (The King v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury) affords an amusing instance of red tapeism and its discomfiture. It appears that a Mr. Smyth (sometime a paymaster of exchequer bills) being invalided, sent in medical certificates, in consequence of which he received an official announcement that a parliamentary vote would be taken for a retired annual allowance to him; and that this vote, in fact, passed the House; though the pension in question was not specifically mentioned in the Appropriation Act of the year, further than by a direction that a certain gross sum should be applied in discharge of retired allowances. Mr. Smyth, however, though continually promised it, could never actually lay hands on his allowance or any part thereof. By successive secretaries to the Treasury, and ultimately by Lord Melbourne, then first lord, himself, he was told that it would assuredly be paid to him, and even the mode of his applying and the proper paymaster pointed out. But on applying for it, he was always referred to some one else; and at length he was called upon, as a condition precedent to its being paid at all, to enter into a bond to abstain from certain legal proceedings he had commenced in respect of the office from which he had retired. This condition, however, Mr. Smyth refused to comply with, and at length in despair went to the Queen's Bench, from which he emerged triumphant, though we fear a much poorer man than when he went in. All the judges of the Court concurred in making absolute the rule for a mandamus for paying to him the annuity and its arrears. It was urged with success that the applicant had no other remedy, and that the application was not in reality against the Crown, but simply against public officers, who having admitted that they had money in their hands voted by Parliament to be paid over to a certain individual, sought illegally to annex certain conditions to the payment.

In the present case, however, the circumstances were very different, and the result was accordingly adverse to the applicant. In the case to which reference has been made, the Treasury had on several occasions admitted that they had received from Parliament money to pay the applicant; but here all that could be shown was, that by statute certain expenses of the county courts, including the expense of stationery, is to be paid by the Treasury out of monies provided by Parliament for such purposes; and that monies had been granted by Parliament for county court expenses generally, for the year in which the applicant had supplied his goods on the order of the registrar. But the case could be carried no further, and the mandamus was refused; Mr. Justice Crompton remarking that the registrar of a county court has no power to pledge the credit of the Treasury Commissioners.

SESSIONS LAW—ADJOURNMENT OF A PART HEARD APPEAL.

Reg. v. The Guardians of the Cambridge Union, Q. B. 9 W. R. 599.

This case settles what has been a somewhat disputed point of sessions law; namely, whether the hearing of an appeal which has been partly heard, can be lawfully adjourned to the following sessions. Hitherto the usual, if not the invariable, practice under such circumstances has been to adjourn the sessions itself, so that the proceedings may go on without interruption; and it has been considered that any other mode of proceeding would be extremely inconvenient. Indeed, in a very recent case (The Queen v. Kendal, 1 Ell. & Ell. p. 492) Mr. Justice Crompton stated it to be his opinion that a case really entered upon could not be adjourned to a subsequent session on the ground of the absence of a material witness. In the present case, however, the same judge concurred with Justices Hill and Blackburn in modifying this opinion so far as to admit that such a course (though generally inconvenient and only to be pursued with the greatest possible caution) was not beyond the jurisdiction of the Court of Quarter Sessions; and this, upon the broad ground that every court has power to control its own proceedings. It was intimated by the Court that where it became necessary so to adjourn a part heard case, the hearing, when the case came on again, ought to commence de novo. It is apprehended that in cases of adjournment there must not be in the provision giving the appeal, any such limitation in point of time as would in fact prevent the appeal being entered at the sessions to which the hearing stands adjourned. In the present case the appeal was against the adjudication of the settlement of a pauper lunatic under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, and by sect. 108 the appeal is to be to the "next" general quarter sessions. No other limitation of time, however, is fixed; and therefore the effect of the present decision is to show the legality of an appeal entered at the sessions held immediately after the adjudication objected to, but determined at a subsequent session.

STAMPS ON AFFIDAVITS.

It appears to me doubtful whether the affidavit filed with copies of bills of sale under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, s. 1, (the Bills of Sale Registration Act) ought not to be on half-a-crown stamp. No form of affidavit is given by the Act, and the practice, I believe, is not to stamp the affidavit; but as the only exemption from stamping is in favour of affidavits to be filed, read, and used in courts of law, and as it does not follow that the affidavit filed with the officer acting as clerk of the docket and judgments in the Court of Queen's Bench under the above section, is or will be read or used in any court, I doubt if the "filing" in the Queen's Bench office can be considered sufficient to bring the case within the exemption.

Will some of your readers give an opinion on the subject, quoting, if possible, any authority on the matter.

PROFESSIONAL ETIQUETTE.

As a matter of etiquette merely, does priority of admission on the rolls, or date of appointment, entitle a perpetual commissioner for taking acknowledgments of deeds by married women, to insert his name first in the certificate of acknowledgment?

As a matter of substance, the order of the names is immaterial, but the question arose in a friendly manner between myself and another commissioner a few days ago.

A PERPETUAL COMMISSIONER.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES

The following extracts on this subject are taken from the Scottish Law Journal for the present month.

A judge in America may be a Member of Congress, and threats have been used in that country in the course of electioneering battles to the effect that, if the electors did not support the candidate who happened also to be a Judge, that the occasion might ere long arrive when the Judge would have the opportunity of squaring accounts. Now, although we know that a magistrate of the City of Glasgow can enjoy very few opportunities of acting on this principle, yet the case is not impossible. We know, for example, that the interest of the licensed victuallers in this city is a somewhat extensive one. Take, then, the case of a spirit-dealer being brought up charged with a breach of certificate, and that the magistrate who is to try the case is a man whose election to the office of town councillor the party charged has eagerly opposed, is it likely that the party charged will, under such circumstances, receive an impartial trial? It is just possible he may, but the probabilities are all on the other side. This is not as it should be. A judge should not only be independent of those subject to his jurisdiction, but they also should be independent of his prejudices and dislikes.

But while we are arguing in this way from principle, how does the case present itself in regard to results of the present system? Do the judgments of our citizen magistrates afford satisfaction or do they not? We venture very confidently to assert that they do not. Two cases out of many we will cite. While one of our magistrates was recently presiding in the police court, a man was charged with the crime of beating his wife. The panel pleaded not guilty, but proof was led, and the worthy magistrate thus addressed the prisoner—"You are proved to have thrashed your pair wife; but you have a sma' family. Noo, whether will I gi'e you a reprimand or send you to jail?" "Oh, yer honour, I'll tak' the reprimand." The prisoner was accordingly reprimanded. On another occasion we heard of a spirit dealer charged with knowingly harbouring prostitutes. It was proved beyond a doubt that the panel had not been in his premises when the offence charged was committed, and that the shop had been left under the care of a young lad, who was a stranger, and who swore that he did not know that the parties, to whom certain small quantities of drink had been sold, during the regular business hours, were prostitutes. The magistrate convicted the absent party on the ground that he had no right to leave his premises in charge of so young a lad. Now the offence charged was not that of leaving the premises in charge of a youth, but for knowingly harbouring prostitutes. But such cases are occurring every day, and so long as the present system continues, the same results will arise.

But a strong argument against citizen magistrates is to be found in the decline, in fact, the absolute discontinuance, of the civil business of the Burgh Courts. When litigants, who have personal interests involved, wish to have these settled, they appeal to a tribunal presided over by a stipendiary magistrate, and not a citizen. If the public then, in their own personal concerns, resort to the arbitrament of an educated and professional judge, is it not equally fair that those who are to be compulsorily arraigned at the bar of a police court, to have questions involving perhaps their fair name and reputation, which is of much greater consequence than any mere question of money, determined, should have the advantage of a tribunal equally fair and equally satisfactory?

Review.

Contrast between the Chancery and Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland and the same Courts in England, &c.
By A RETIRED SOLICITOR. London: T. F. A. Day, 13, Carey-street. Dublin: Hodges, Smith & Co., 104, Grafton-street, 1861.

A perusal of this outline of the comparative anatomy of the tribunals of England and Ireland cannot fail to be interesting even to those who limit their speculation to our own legal sphere, or who may agree with the author in regarding it as an approach to optimism. "Rectum est enim," says Lord Bacon, "index et sui et obliqui."

The writer commences his sketch by stating that at no period in the history of Ireland since the celebrated Poyning's Act, 10 Hen. 7, has the administration of Irish law differed so much from that of England. Reforms have been rejected, and innovations, such as the Landed Estates Court Act, gladly accepted by Ireland. The author attributes this anomalous state of things partly to the fact that Ireland has no law-lords to represent her interests, and partly to the want of judicial statistics for that country.

The author alleges that the Irish Court of Chancery Regulation Act, 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 89, differs essentially from the principle of the English Chancery Acts, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. cc. 80, 86. We think, however, that the difference between the Irish and English Chancery systems is not as great as he conceives. The masters' offices, indeed, continue still to flourish in Ireland, and much of the class of business that is transacted in England by the judge himself at chambers, is, in Ireland, transacted by the master. It is, we admit, very desirable that a single judge, "par negotiis nec supra" should superintend the entire course of a suit. But this is really the case as to very many chancery suits in Ireland, the masters in 15th section cases, which correspond to our proceedings by summons, having almost the entire judicial, as well as the administrative, management of a suit. The allowance of fees for the attendance of counsel, however, so freely certified by the masters in Ireland, does appear to be an abuse. Counsel are by no means likely to be of much use in the investigation of accounts and inquiries, that is, as to most of the ministerial business of the Court. The system of certificates by the chief clerks is, likewise, eminently superior to that of masters' reports, which still prevails in Ireland,—reports prepared by the counsel of the party in whose favour the order is made, and which are also open to the general objection of a technical verbiage. There is no distinction in Ireland as to court fees and costs, whatever be the value of the property administered. This is also an evil which, considering the small amounts for which suits in Ireland are often instituted, deserves attention. Applications for time to plead are made in England before the chief clerks; in Ireland, upon motion by counsel before the Court, which cannot be as competent as the chief clerks to judge of the time requisite to prepare answers accounts, &c. No appeal can be taken to any ruling of a master in Ireland without the previous deposit of £10 as a security for costs. This certainly may often amount to a denial of justice. We see no objection to the masters being constituted independent judges, as they were virtually by the Irish Chancery Act of 1850, as to 15th section causes, and thus made to correspond rather to the present vice-chancellors of England than to the old English masters. But the gross defect of the Irish system appears to be the multiplication of intermediate appellate Courts, with progressive checks to the prosecution of appeals by deposits, &c.

The 15th section of the Irish Chancery Regulation Act, 1850, empowered the Irish Lord Chancellor to transfer to the master "such branches of the jurisdiction of the Court as by any general order he shall from time to time direct." The Chancellor, in the exercise of this power, directed that suits concerning charges on land should be thus transferred. This class of causes is, doubtless, very numerous in Ireland, there being no less than 1,000 estates in that country under receivers; while we learn from the judicial statistics of 1859 that there were only 473 cases of receivers' accounts for that year in England. Irish causes under the 15th section consist of ex parte petitions, of which the respondent gets no notice until there has been an order of reference made thereon to the master. They are thus heard pro forma before the Lord Chancellor, who merely reads the petition to see whether it comes properly under the 15th section class. But, surely, such a hearing, which in almost all cases is followed by an order of course referring the matter to the master, is altogether a ludicrous waste of time and cost. Accordingly, Lord Chancellor Napier intended to have dispensed with this formal hearing.

An appeal from the master to the Court must be brought within a fortnight. The author considers this time too 'short. A month is the term we feel disposed to recommend, as suited to the requirements of an appeal as well as the prompt administration of justice.

It appears that the suitors cash in the English Court of Chancery on the 1st October, 1858, was £2,607,250 2s. 6d.; the corresponding return for the Irish Court of Chancery was £83,791 3s. 9½d. The cash in court in England was thus more than thirty times the amount in the Irish court.

The payment of cash and stock out of the two courts for the last three years was as follows:—

Years.	Cash.			Stock.			Aggregate.

The writer of this pamphlet is disposed to infer from these returns that one of the chief clerks in England administers more business in one year, than is to be found in the annals of the four Irish masters for the same period. But Irish suits are often instituted for excessively small sums; and the general average for all is by no means likely to be equal to that of English causes. It is only from the number of suits, therefore, that any inference as to the actual amount of business transacted can be drawn. Thus the total amount of Chancery costs taxed in England in any one year is only four times as great as the amount of Irish Chancery costs for the same period. A "Solicitor" infers from this that the Irish procedure is proportionately expensive; but, as we have shown, this inference is not entirely warranted by the data, the amount for which the average of Irish suits are instituted being small.

The scale of court charges in Ireland is in some instances enormous. A search in England extending from the year 1788 to 1861 in England costs only 6d., in Ireland a similar search would cost £4 17s. 4d., being at the rate of 1s. 4d. a-year. The charge for office copies in Ireland is one-third higher than it is in England. Irish solicitors, on the other hand, are not remunerated equally well as their English brethren, and are never consulted upon matters of law reform. A Suitor's Fund has never existed in Ireland, though a Suitor's Fee Fund has.

Appeals to the House of Lords must be brought within a year. This appears to the author to be too short a period for final appeal. It is, however, by no means desirable that facilities should be given for protracted litigation; and, for our part, we do not consider this an objection of much moment to the Irish procedure.

The author of this interesting and important pamphlet concludes the first part of his essay by recommending an assimilation of the chancery procedure of both countries; the restricting the master to enquiries and accounts; and the disuse, as much as possible, of the attendance of counsel, except when questions of law require to be discussed. On the whole, we concur with the views propounded by the writer. The main scope of his recommendations, however, could be carried into effect by constituting the masters vice-chancellors, and diminishing their number to two; by giving them a completely original jurisdiction in 15th section causes; and by abridging the number of intermediate appellate judicatures. The author has not touched the question of consolidating the Landed Estates Court and the Irish Court of Chancery. A chancery suitor in Ireland may, indeed, at present have the estate on which he has a charge sold in the Landed Estates Court. But it would be obviously desirable that chancery suitors should never be obliged to resort to another jurisdiction for effectuating the decree of the Court. The arguments stated ante, vol. 4, p. , in favour of consolidating the Court of Probate with the Court of Chancery apply still more forcibly to the consolidation of the Irish Chancery and Landed Estates Courts. The state of the business in the Irish Courts of Equity would, probably, admit of three superior equity judges, with as many chief clerks, transacting all the business at present administered in that country by the Chancery and the Landed Estates Court judges and the respective masters of these courts. We recommend a perusal of this pamphlet, as containing a concise summary of important data, and no small amount of valuable suggestions.

The second part of this pamphlet contrasts the common law procedure in Ireland with the like procedure in England. The author states that judges' summonses are unknown in Ireland. But the practice is, nevertheless, essentially the same in this respect as the English. The only difference is that Irish summonses are drawn by the attorney's pro re nata. These applications, in very many cases, as when made for time to plead, for liberty to plead double matter, or for similar objects, not affecting the merits, are made and granted without notice. "A Solicitor," therefore, appears in this respect to have attached too much importance to mere nomenclature. He gives, however, returns of a startling nature as to the costs of these motions. The total of common and special orders made on summonses in England for the year 1858 was 45,458; for 1859, the total was 44,870. The returns for Ireland for the corresponding years were respectively 1,622 and 1,782. In 1858, a single judge Erie (C.J.) made 7,948 orders. Of these orders made in England in 1859, only 3,555 were made upon summonses at which counsel attended. In Ireland, on the contrary, counsel attend on almost every transaction. The return of motions made in the Irish Court of Common Pleas, for instance, in 1858, was 537. The return adds "counsel attended in every case for both or either parties." This is, certainly, a state of things which eminently demands attention.

The increase of Irish judges from nine to twelve, took place by the mere exercise of the prerogative, and not by statute. There is, therefore, in the opinion of the writer of this pamphlet, no statutory obligation on the part of the Crown to fill up all vacancies. We also observe that the salaries of the county court judges or assistant-barristers in Ireland have been recently raised, while the business of these courts has diminished. The practitioners' scale of fees in these courts is, on the other hand, exceedingly small, and, therefore, tends to throw business into the superior courts.

The writer contrasts the improved system of English jury trials as to the addresses of counsel (as recommended by the report of the commissioners of 1831), with the method still pursued in Ireland, where the counsel who sums up is not the counsel who has opened the case. There are thus two long speeches on each side, to the great weariness of jurors, and the loss of time to them and the suitors.

A "Solicitor" states, and, we think truly, "that the average time occupied in the trial of a record at Westminster is not one-third of that consumed by a trial at Dublin." He sighs for the application of judicial statistics to the proceedings in the Irish courts. We join heartily in his wish.

The system of common law pleading in Ireland differs somewhat from the English procedure. Special issues alone can be sent for trial in Ireland, and these are generally settled upon motion of counsel by a judge, who may or may not be the judge who tries the case. The Scotch practice of "condescendence" resembles this method, except that in Scotland the judge who settles the issues is always the judge who tries the case. He may also allow the general issue to be pleaded and tried. This is never permitted in Ireland. The Scotch system, however, which is far less technical than the Irish, has been repeatedly condemned on appeals by Lords Campbell, Truro, and Brougham. The statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, which has enabled the courts of equity in both countries to try questions of fact with the aid of juries, has made no provision as to the settlement of issues. It is probable, therefore, that such issues when called for will be settled in both countries according to their respective common law procedure, in obedience to the maxim, "æquitas sequitur legem."

Much a priori speculation is precluded by statistics. The judicial statistics for the years 1859 and 1860 show that only one-fourth of the actions commenced are ever fully litigated. It is obvious, therefore, that special pleading is in three-fourths of the cases unnecessary, since the demand is in all these bona fide, and the defendant has no ground for doubting the nature of the claim. This is the principle of the English writ of summons and its indorsement. The Irish summons, on the contrary, always embodies a declaration. The 85th section of the English Common Law Procedure Act provides that "the signature of counsel is not required in any case." The 33rd Irish General Order, on the contrary, directs that "all pleadings subsequent to summons and plaint shall be signed by counsel." The writer of this pamphlet considers that the House of Lords were surprised into passing the Irish Act, and that they considered it to be a mere transcript of the analogous English statute. The language of Lord Cranworth (Hansard, Par. Deb. 3 ser., vol. 123, p. 8) certainly supports this view. It appears to the writer that it was owing to the like mistake that the provisions of the English Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 were in 1856 extended almost verbatim to Ireland, and thus engrafted upon a heterogeneous system.

The Irish Common Law Procedure Act requires pleadings under it to be far more special than the English Act and the rules of T. T. 1853 prescribe. Thus the former statute abolishes the general issue, "even by" statute. According to the English rules of T. T. 1853, the pleas non assumpsit, "never indebted," &c., are, except in actions upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, admissible, though with a limited meaning, as defences by denial of the matters of fact stated in the declaration. All matters of confession and avoidance must be specially pleaded in either country. The plea of nil debet is not allowed by either class of tribunals. But the plea of nil detinet is allowed by the 15th English rule of T. T. 1853, to operate as a denial of the fact of the detention. So also non est factum, is allowed by the 10th of the English rules to operate as a denial of the execution of a deed. Except in actions upon bills of exchange or promissory notes, the general issue (with the exception of nil debet), can thus be pleaded in England in any action either upon contract or tort; but with a limited meaning given to the denial, and consequently with a limitation of the evidence which may be given under it. But in Ireland all such defences are invalidated by the 70th and 71st section of the Irish Act in all actions whether upon bills of exchange, contract, or tort. We are by no means sure that this is a defect in the Irish system. As the general issue has been in substance abolished in England, some confusion of ideas is apt to be occasioned by the use of words that formerly meant the general issue, but mean so no longer. It appears to be a more simple course to abolish, as the Irish Act has done, the use of old names, when the old purpose for which they were used, viz., a surprise on the plaintiff, has been prohibited.

The Irish Act incorporates a good portion of the English enactment, together with the substance of many of the English rules of T. T. 1853; while it carries out fully the principle upon which these were formed, viz., the necessity of special pleading in all cases.

Both the Irish and English Acts present numerous features of resemblance. Both statutes abolish technical pleading, express colour, special traverses, &c., and admit of a joinder of different causes of action. Both Acts likewise admit of pleading and demurring together, and pleading several matters with the leave of a judge, and certain several defences without such leave.

The author concludes his pamphlet by recommending an assimilation of the procedure of both countries. He also suggests, that as the English bar participates in appeals from Ireland, so the Irish bar should be allowed to practise in all appeals before the Privy Council and House of Lords. This is a privilege which would, doubtless, be readily conceded to the Irish bar. An assimilation of the procedure of both countries does not, we think, stand in need of any discursive recommendation. It is manifest that, if the English procedure has worked well for England (and this the concurrent testimony of Royal commissioners and of the public establishes), it should necessarily be completely extended to Ireland, where no antiquated nomenclature, as in Scotland, impedes the immediate adoption of any extensive measure of reform.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

TRINITY TERM, 1861.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

Germain Lavie, M.A., aged 25, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Oliverson and Peachy, of Frederick's-place, London; and Messrs. Crowder, Maynard, Son, and Lawford, of Coleman-street, London.

Charles Albert Bannister, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Pearson, of Guildhall, London; and Messrs. Davidson, Bradbury, and Hardwick, of Basinghall-street, London.

William Henry Churton, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. John and George Holden, of Liverpool; and Messrs. Cunliffe & Beaumont, of Chancery-lane, London.

William Crump Thomas, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Duignan and Ebsworth, of Walsall; and Messrs. Mackeson and Goldring, of Lincoln's-inn-fields, London.

Charles Buckley, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Ponsonby, of Oldham; and Mr. William Hunt, of Gray's-inn, London.

Abel Tillett, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. Wace Lockett Mendham, of Norwich.

The council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Lavie, the Prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn.

To Mr. Bannister, the Prize of the Honourable Society of Clement's-inn.

To Mr. Churton, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Thomas, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Buckley, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Tillett, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

Henry Botterill, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. England, Saxelbye, and Roberts, of Hull.

George John Cuddon, aged 24, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Blount and Davis, of Usk; Messrs. Duncan, Squarey, Duncan, and Blackmore, of Liverpool; and Messrs. Field and Roscoe, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, London.

Benjamin Green Lake, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Messrs. H. and G. Lake and Kendall, of Lincoln's Inn, London.

Henry Fricker Lawes the younger, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Dix, of Bristol; and Messrs. Meredith and Lucas, of Lincoln's Inn, London.

Charles Frederick Lowe, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Falkner and Newbold, of Newark.

Frederick Heygate Nunneley, aged 24, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Staniland and Chapman, of Boston; Messrs. Staniland and Wigglesworth, of Boston; and Messrs. Tooke and Co., of Bedford Row, London.

Frederick Danby Palmer, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Reynolds and Palmer, of Great Yarmouth; and Messrs. Gray and Woodcock, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, London.

Frederick William Pamphilon, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Day, of Queen-street, May Fair, London.

The Council have accordingly awarded them Certificates of Merit.

The Examiners have further announced to the following candidates that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to Prizes or Certificates of Merit if they had been under the age of 26:—

George Brown, aged 32, who served his clerkship to Mr. Henry Newton, of York.

Sutton John Elliott, aged 26, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Henry Binsteed, of Portsmouth.

John Bridges Nunn, aged 26, who served his clerkship to Mr. Albert Dixon, of Bedford-row; Mr. George Matthews Arnold, of Gravesend; and Mr. Richard Higgins Burne, of Carey-street, London.

William Conning Shepherd, aged 28, who served his clerkship to Messrs. De Jersey and Micklem, of Gresham-street West, London.

William Theodore Pitt Watkins, aged 28, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Harris, of Bristol; and Mr. Richard Walter Pigeon, of Bristol.

The number of candidates examined in this Term was 125; of these, 120 were passed, and 5 postponed.

LAW LIFE ASSURANCE OFFICE, FLEET

STREET, LONDON.—23rd May, 1861.—NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that in conformity with the provisions of the deed of settlement, a General Meeting of the Proprietors of the Law Life Assurance Society, will be held at the Society's Office, Fleet-street, London, on Monday, the 24th day of June next, at Twelve o'clock at noon precisely, to elect an Auditor, in the room of William Henry Walton, Esq., who has resigned, to elect Six Directors, and one other Auditor, and for general purposes.

By Order of the Directors,

WILLIAM SAMUEL DOWNES, Actuary.

THE LANDS IMPROVEMENT COMPANY is Incorporated by special Act of Parliament for England, Wales, and Scotland. Under the Company's Acts, tenants for life, trustee, mortgagees in possession, incumbents of livings, bodies corporate, certain leasees, and other landowners, are empowered to charge the inheritance with the cost of improvements, whether the money be borrowed from the Company or advanced by the landowner out of his own funds.

The Company advance money, unlimited in amount, for works of improvement, the loans and incidental expenses being liquidated by a rent-charge for a specified term of years.

No investigation of title is required, and the Company, being of a strictly commercial character, do not interfere with the plans and execution of the works, which are controlled only by the Enclosure Commissioners.

The improvements authorized comprise drainage, irrigation, warping, embanking, enclosing, clearing, reclaiming, planting, erecting, and improving farm-houses, and buildings for farm purposes, farm roads, jetties, steam-engines, water-wheels, tanks, pipes, &c.

Owners in fee may effect improvements on their estates without incurring the expense and personal responsibilities incident to mortgages, and with out regard to the amount of existing incumbrances. Proprietors may apply jointly for the execution of improvements mutually beneficial, such as a common outfall, roads through the district, water-power, &c.

For further information, and for forms of application, apply to the Hon. WILLIAM NAPIER, Managing Director, 2, Old Palace-yard, Westminster.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Attorney-General's eagerness to complain of the treatment which the Bankruptcy Bill had suffered in the House of Lords was injudicious, although not unnatural. The alterations made by the Select Committee were necessarily accepted by the Lord Chancellor in the Upper House, because defeat was inevitable if he had resisted them. But it remains to be seen what course the Government will pursue in the Lower House when the Bill comes again before it. As regards the appointment of a chief judge, it cannot be denied that the opinions expressed against it are of great weight. Lord Wensleydale thought that never before had there been a proposal to create so unnecessary an office. It should not be forgotten that the list of appeals in Chancery is very light, and that the courts both of the Lord Chancellor and of the Lords Justices remained closed on Thursday and Friday of this week, being the first two days of the present sittings. In the face of this fact it seems difficult to contend that the Lords Justices will not have time to dispose of all appeals in bankruptcy. It would be very undesirable to see the fulfilment of the prediction of Lord Overstone, that when the novelty of this appointment should have worn away, it would assume the character of a job. The adoption of the proposal for this appointment by the House of Commons is an instance of what has been remarked before, that that House has now a tendency to extravagance quite as strong as was its disposition in former times to parsimony. Those who desire to preserve the efficiency of the judicial bench against indiscreet economists will do well to be equally on their guard against any plan which involves unnecessary expenditure. By moderating the hot fit they may gain influence which will be useful when in turn the cold fit comes. In this view we think that the almost unanimous decision of the Committee and the strong opinions uttered in the House deserve the serious attention of all who wish to see the Bill passed in a useful shape. We think, also, that Lord Overstone is right in saying that this Committee would not have lost credit if its proceedings had taken place in public. It seems to have bestowed a great deal of labour upon the Bill, and to have acted in general with impartiality; but, of course, the Committee as well as the House is open to the imputation of a tenderness for nontraders in embarrassed circumstances, which is not felt in the great circles of society.

The Times City article of yesterday contains the following statement in reference to the alterations made in the Bankruptcy Bill by the House of Lords:—"The committee of the Mercantile Law Amendment Society have issued their report upon the alterations made in the Bankruptcy Bill by the House of Lords. It deplores the loss of the chief judge, and of those clauses which enabled the creditors to take the realization of a bankrupt's estate out of the hands of the official assignee, and give it to agents selected by themselves. The committee express their opinion that unless the creditors' assignee clauses are restored, the Bill had better be rejected. A petition is now in course of signature and has already been most influentially signed, asking the House of Commons to restore most of the provisions in the Bill which were struck out by the House of Lords."

An occurrence at Baltimore affords a practical demonstration that, in America, law has given place to arms. A respectable inhabitant of Maryland was arrested by military force, and imprisoned in a fort. The charge against him was that he had assisted to burn the railroad bridges at the time of the outbreak in Baltimore. It appears that he had done this at the command of the constituted authorities. "In order to test the question whether any law existed in the country," the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States came to Baltimore, and issued a writ of habeas corpus directed to the general in command of the army of occupation. We regret to have to state that the result of this experiment was unsatisfactory. The general sent to say that he could not obey the writ; and thereupon the Chief Justice issued an attachment against the general, which necessarily remained unexecuted. The only resource of the Chief Justice was to proclaim to an excited audience the glorious principles of Anglo-Saxon liberty—with great effect, as it seems, upon the writer who describes the scene, but with no effect at all upon the general. The Chief Justice declared that his marshal could legally summon a posse comitatus to arrest the general; but he was wise enough to see that the army of occupation—whatever may be its military deficiencies—would be a grievous overmatch both for the majesty and the myrmidons of the law. The Chief Justice further declared his intention to call upon the President to enforce the law according to his inauguration oath. The unfortunate President will be a man of singular forbearance if he does not answer the Chief Justice to the effect that he may protest and go about his business. Perhaps this "able assertion of principles" by an eminent American lawyer of fourscore, may console us when next we have to listen to the unseasonable loquacity of some of our own great but waning legal luminaries. The most dignified course for the Chief Justice of the United States would be to pack up his writs and his books and betake himself to some quiet place until the violence of war be mitigated. If he be so old and so wise as he is reputed, he ought not to be ignorant that inter arma silent leges. It will be well if, where arms have been placed in the hands of Irishmen and Germans, the voice of the law shall regain its influence even when those arms are or ought to be laid down.

The courts of equity recommenced their sittings on Thursday, the 20th inst. Of the causes and other matters down for hearing before each Court, comprising the arrears remaining at the rising of the Court on the last day of Trinity Term and the causes since entered, there are—long vacation, we may mention that Vice-Chancellor Wood devoted the whole of Thursday and Friday to hearing motions, sitting each day until after four o'clock; and on Friday evening several pressing motions remained undisposed of, standing over to the next seal. It is obvious that the difficulty of getting motions heard in this branch of the Court, operates to create a sort of monopoly of business in the hands of counsel whose standing at the bar entitles them to move early in the day. This serious evil, no doubt, arises from the reputation which Sir W. P. Wood enjoys, and from the consequent desire to bring before him a great number of motions for injunctions in railway and patent and other important cases. Such cases are, of course, entrusted to leading counsel, and they necessarily occupy a good deal of time; and as his Honour usually declines to abridge his cause days by extending the seal beyond one, or, on rare occasions, two days, it follows that smaller motions by smaller men find great difficulty in getting made at all. We think that this long delay of motions, and the repeated attendances in court which it occasions, is no small drawback to the efficiency of the court in which it occurs. It is, however, far easier to point out the evil than to suggest a remedy.

A correspondent of the Daily News writes under a natural feeling of indignation at getting a letter from a sheriff's officer announcing that he had authority to distrain upon the writer's goods for the amount of a fine imposed on him for non-attendance as a juror at the quarter sessions. It appears that the writer had been summoned to attend at Maidstone on the 11th of April. On the 9th, being laid up with violent influenza, he obtained a certificate from his medical attendant and sent it by post to the clerk of the peace. It does not seem to have occurred to him that the law which prescribes the attendance of jurymen at sessions and assizes is much older than the institution of the post. The clerk of the peace might very reasonably object that the duty of receiving and deciding upon the genuineness and sufficiency of such certificates is not a duty which he undertakes, and for the discharge of which he is remunerated. The writer of the letter thinks that nothing can be easier than to attend to it. The recipient doubtless murmurs at an unauthorised invasion of his precious time. The law which must decide between them is not so absurd as to say that a jurymen shall appear in person to state that he cannot come; and, on the other hand, it does not allow personal attendance to be as a matter of course avoided by merely sending a certificate of indisposition. The writer complains not only of the threat of distress in his own case, but also in that of an officer of volunteers, who was on duty at Hythe at the time of the quarter sessions. It does not appear that in this case either the clerk of the peace, or any other functionary received a letter, but it seems to be expected that the Court should take a sort of official notice of the fact, as one known to all the world, that Mr. So-and-So was serving his country at Hythe. The writer's own case may be a very proper one for remission of the fine, but we can scarcely join in his complaint of the want of notice that it had been inflicted. Probably this may have been his first discovery of the truth that authority commits many violent acts, even in a free country.

MARITIME PUBLIC LAW—CONTRABAND OF WAR— LAWS OF BLOCKADE.

No. II.

The general freedom of neutral commerce does not admit of dealings with the enemy as to contraband of war. These articles are warlike instruments, or matériel. It is hard to enumerate the articles which may be so termed. The quality of the port—whether it be a military or a commercial one—to which the doubtful goods are bound, affords an element for determining their nature, as contraband or not. Even provisions have been sometimes considered as contraband during a siege, or a straitness of provisions. Thus in 1793 England issued a declaration that she would consider the sending of provisions to France as a dealing in contraband. Great Britain rested this ordinance upon two grounds—the probability of reducing the French by famine, and her own scarcity of these articles. The ordinance, however, directed that the invoice price, with a reasonable allowance for freight and demurrage, should be given to the owners. This adjunct shows that provisions cannot properly be deemed contraband, unless in very special cases; since, whenever articles may be confiscated as contraband, no equivalent need be given for them. Provisions, indeed, may be confiscated, when an attempt is made to introduce them into a besieged city. But the reason for this rule is, that such an attempt is a violation of the laws of blockade. It appears thus that provisions ought not to be included in the general category of contraband. An article must be contraband in se to afford ground for prohibition or confiscation; any other principle applied to determine what is contraband and what is not, might exclude all belligerent trade with neutrals. A full indemnification, both for the loss of a market and every other inconvenience was granted by Great Britain to those American citizens who had suffered loss by the Order in Council of April, 1795, which, as we have stated, included provisions in the list of contraband. The British Order in Council of the 24th of April 1854, restricts contraband articles to the three following classes: 1st, gunpowder, saltpetre, and brimstone; 2nd, arms and ammunition; and 3rd, marine engines and boilers and the component parts thereof.

A neutral ship carrying the despatches or soldiers of the enemy is liable to confiscation by the other belligerent, even though the master had been compelled to do so by force, or had been ignorant of the character of such passengers or despatches. Any other rule would afford unlimited facilities for fraud upon belligerents. Force or ignorance will, however, entitle the master to compensation from the enemy's government. See Robinson's Adm. Reps., vol. 6, p. 430, The Orozembo; and p. 440, The Atalanta. The carrying of despatches is thus more severely punished than a trade in contraband, the prohibited articles alone, and not the ship, being in the latter case confiscated. The despatches of an ambassador or other public minister of a belligerent, as also letters posted in the ordinary course, are not comprised in the category of enemy's despatches. As, notwithstanding the adoption of the maxim "Free ships, free goods," the right to search for contraband still continues, it is advisable that the list be diminished as much as possible. Hitherto, the subjects of neutral states have not been prohibited by their governments from carrying contraband—they do this at their own peril. It would be eminently desirable that all occasion for search should as far as possible be removed, either by a thorough alteration of the law of contraband, or by a prohibition on the part of each neutral government against such trading. The right of search may, in the present liberal tendencies, be the more easily limited in its range, inasmuch as the right to search for the purpose of impressment has never been claimed to be exercised for its own merits, but only as incidental to the right of search for enemy's goods or for contraband. A search may, indeed, under any code be necessary to inquire as to breaches of blockade; but such causes for search can only rarely occur, as, if the offending vessel be not at once captured, the subsequent ascertainment of her identity would be well nigh impossible.

As to breaches of blockade we need not offer many observations. To constitute such an offence, three things must be proved—first, the existence of an actual blockade; secondly, the knowledge of the alleged offender; and thirdly, the act of violation. The recent declaration of the United States, that all the ports of the Confederate States are to be deemed blockaded, appears to be wholly unwarranted either by the general law of nations, or even by the purport of any treaty; for the former states have stationed no marine force along the coasts of the Confederate States, that bears any proportion to the requirements of such a blockade. A neutral ship departing from the place blockaded, can only take away a cargo bonâ fide purchased and delivered before the commencement of the blockade. It cannot in any way assist the exportation of the property of the enemy, except by the interior canal navigation of the country. The legal blockade is thus only co-extensive with the actual investment of the place. The offence of violating a blockade continues to be punishable until the end of the return voyage of the vessel, provided that the blockade continues down to that time. The laws of blockade were, a few months ago, the subject of diplomatic communication between the British and United States Governments. The latter government was then opposed to the proposition that private property on board belligerent vessels should be free, but, somewhat inconsistently, disapproved of blockades in the case of commercial ports, unless these should be at the same time besieged by land. The same government likewise declared that it considered all attempts to interrupt trade by a blockade, or to blockade commercial ports, to be abuses of belligerent rules. This is part of the general question as to the pressure which war should be allowed to exercise upon maritime trade. The influence of war in this respect should, doubtless, be restricted as much as possible. But an alteration of the present laws of blockade would be almost futile, unless merchant ships upon the ocean could be free from capture.

As long as the right to seize merchant vessels, private property, or contraband of any kind, is permitted, the right of search follows as a natural consequence. It may be necessary to ascertain whether a neutral flag be not assumed for the purpose of escape by a vessel really belligerent. Resistance to search by a neutral convoy, or a neutral master, subjects all the fleet and merchandise to capture; but such resistance by a hostile master does not affect the neutral property on board. The American courts have decided that a neutral has a right to carry his goods in an armed enemy's vessel, and would probably allow a right to do so even under a hostile convoy. The Neride, Cranch's Rep. vol. ix. p. 380. The English courts have held that in both cases alike the neutral property may be confiscated. The Fanny, Dodson's Adm. Rep. vol. i. p. 443. The right of visitation for the purpose merely of ascertaining the nationality or non-piratical character of a vessel, can never be wholly abrogated. Neither can this right of visitation be confined to the cruisers of the nation whose flag is hoisted by the suspected craft. All states, whether great or small, and whether with or without a navy, are equally independent of each other. If the right of visitation, therefore, were confined to the cruisers of the alleged nation of the suspected vessel—a proposition earnestly advocated by Americans—the consequence would be, that a pirate had only to hoist the flag of Lubeck or Monaco, or of some other equally insignificant place, and so escape capture. The right of visitation, however, is easily distinguished from the right of inquisitorial search; and no argument for the continuance of the former can be used in favour of the illiberal policy of maritime search and captures.

The resolutions of the Paris Congress of 1856 were as follows:—

"1. Privateering remains abolished.

"2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

"3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under the enemy's flag

"4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effectual; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient wholly to prevent access to the coasts of the enemy."

America was not a party to these resolutions. Complications of a most intricate nature are, therefore, likely to arise in the present American civil war from this conflict of laws, as also from the fact that the northern states regard the confederated states as rebels and pirates, and may treat them, or persons in their service, as such, and not give them, as we do, the rights of belligerents. The Confederate States have, in the present war, proclaimed that "free ships will make free goods." The United States have not done so, and, not having signed the Paris declaration, they are only bound by the rule stated as regards those nations with whom they have expressly entered into such a stipulation by treaty. The ships of these nations will not, therefore, be searched by the enemies of the United States for enemies' property, while, according to the law of nations, ours may, as we have no treaty rights with the United States in contravention of the international rule.

England and France have resolved to treat the Confederate States of America as belligerents, and not as pirates, in their present contest with the United States. This course is founded upon the general rule of international law, stated ante, p. 554, which cannot allow foreign nations to entertain any question relating to the justice of the cause of either of the belligerent parties. Their position as such de facto towards each other gives them a status de jure as regards foreigners. The Greeks and the Spanish colonists of America have been treated by us as belligerents; and, certainly, the Confederate States have quite as good a claim to such a status as the countries mentioned. Both England and France have prohibited their subjects from accepting letters of marque from either of the American belligerents, or in any way taking part in the warfare. Both the belligerents are prohibited from bringing prizes into British ports. They may bring them into French ports for twenty-four hours, but cannot sell them there, except clandestinely. We fear, however, that this prohibition against sale is in many cases likely to be rendered nugatory.

The American Government, notwithstanding their previous very liberal tendencies, were unwilling, in 1854, to consent to the abolition of privateering, unless maritime captures of private property were likewise prohibited. We altogether concur with the views of the United States in this respect. America herself illustrates the soundness of the conjoint proposition. That country has a small navy in proportion to her merchant marine. In the event of a war arising between her and Great Britain, whose navy is many times greater than that of America, the latter country would, if privateering were abolished, be precluded from resorting to her merchant marine. Such a policy would entail upon that country, and upon all others similarly circumstanced, the necessity of having large naval establishments even in time of peace. As the foreign commerce of the States is nearly equal to that of Great Britain, the former country would also, in the contingency proposed, find her merchant ships placed in great danger during a war, not only with a first-rate, but even with a second-rate naval power, owing to the fact that American ships are to be found everywhere, and consequently, present many facilities for attack that a less commercial nation does not. The system of privateering, however, prevents such anomalous and undesirable results. Moreover, in point of principle, the capture of private property at sea by an armed cruiser does not appear to be one whit less objectionable than the same act done by a privateer. The objection to privateering is professedly founded upon the principle that the private property of unoffending enemies ought to be exempted from capture. This principle, however, would be but ill, if at all, aided by the abolition of privateering, unless private property was also protected from attack by national ships of war. If the system of levying a contribution upon merchant ships of the enemy intercepted at sea were substituted for privateering, it would, doubtless, be in itself a great improvement, as well as a step towards the assimilation of belligerent rights by land and by sea. Such a compromise of international disputes is, perhaps, the most that is likely to be realized for some time to come.

The present state of the law of belligerent rights at sea, as settled by the Paris treaty of 1856, suggests considerations of a very serious nature. The Paris Congress has declared that in future "Free bottoms make free goods," or, in other words, that "the flag shall cover the cargo." Let us now consider the results of this international law with respect to England in time of peace—and in time of war. When England is at peace, and other nations are at war, the obvious tendency of this law is to cast the carrying trades of the belligerents into the hands of those maritime nations who offer the best terms and advantages. It may be expected, therefore, that in such circumstances England will obtain a fair, if not the lion's share, of this commercial spoil. Before we consider the effects of the Paris declaration of 1856 upon the trade of England in time of war, let us examine the operation of the law prior to that period. Such a review may help us in forming an estimate of the changes effected in 1856, as also in arriving at some further development of international ethics, which may be more consistent with general, as well as with British interests. Before the year 1856 the cargoes of belligerents were carried in national or neutral ships almost indifferently, since such goods could be seized under any flag. The belligerent which had a command of convoys suffered comparatively little injury. But the risk or cost of insurance sustained by the weaker maritime nation, disabled it from entering into competition in foreign markets with its former rivals; its ships were laid up in port, and its commerce was extinguished. The international code prior to 1856 was thus eminently favourable to Great Britain when engaged in war. It left her almost unaffected by its existence, while it operated to depress the enemy. But the effects of the present law are just the very reverse of the former state of things upon the commercial interests of England, when once she becomes involved in war. She cannot now, as heretofore, destroy the export trade of the enemy, as the latter can avoid all risk by embarking his goods on board the ships of neutrals, while British ships will be avoided even by our own merchants. Thus, though a sufficient convoy may be had for the most urgent necessities of British trade, the foreign carrying trade of Great Britain is at once damaged more or less seriously, and all shipping interests thrown out of order, more or less in proportion to the maritime strength of the enemy. Moreover, as England possesses the largest mercantile marine of any nation, the present state of the law must, ex necessitate rei, inflict greater injury upon her than upon any rival. There is, however, a moral executive in nature, and a nation seldom foregoes a national advantage from a laudable and sufficient motive, without receiving, after some days, the bread which it has thus cast upon the waters. In the first place, this depression of shipping interests causes an excess of hands beyond the demand, and, consequently, facilitates the manning of the navy. In the next place, while the enemy's ships are almost all shut up in port, British ships can still continue to trade, though at a disadvantage as compared with neutrals, and thus afford a constant source of supply for the requirements of the navy. These, however, are only partial compensations for the general loss, which the present state of the law tends to inflict. The shipping committee of last year recommended that all private property at sea should be respected during war. Lord Clarendon's opinion, however, was adverse to such a proposition; and the result has been a postponement of the question.

The question of belligerent rights at sea is of especial importance to a maritime nation, whose resources in war depend chiefly on its navy. Such a power, if it have great maritime strength, possesses much greater facilities than a military power of equal rank for crippling the trade of its opponent, especially if this latter country is to any great extent dependant upon imports which are conveyed to it from distant countries by sea. In such a case a hostile navy is an effectual executive for the enforcement of decrees of a Berlin nature. These can be evaded with comparative ease so far as traffic by land is concerned, as experience sufficiently shows. Public opinion in this country seems inclined to adopt the principles recommended by the Shipping Committee of last year, and to suffer all ships, as well as all goods, on the high seas in time of war to pass free. It is quite possible that so complete a carrying out of the principles involved in the Paris declaration of 1856 might actually restore the old advantages of England, just as equilibrium is maintained by subtracting a weight from both scales. Our fiscal resources would continue almost unaffected by war. The question, however, is one fraught with difficulties. If merchant ships are to pass free in all cases, then a number of war vessels may assume a peaceful character, and so surprise the antagonist state, or they may contain arms and ammunition. Notwithstanding these obvious impediments to the practice of so liberal a commercial policy in time of war, nevertheless, we think that the weight of argument favours the adoption of the recommendations of the committee. An assumption of a mercantile character by a vessel of war might be prohibited by the laws of all nations, and punished by them; and thus an abuse of the new maritime code prevented. A search for stores of a military nature may also continue to be authorized without much inconvenience to trade. With these qualifications, we think that the propositions of the Shipping Committee may be viewed favourably. The legal complications arising from the present state of the international code, which we have endeavoured succinctly to describe in these papers, can, it is obvious, be precluded only by the declarations of a general congress of the representatives of European and of American states. The necessity that exists for such an Amphictyonic gathering cannot be exaggerated or denied. We may, therefore, look forward to the immediate assembling of such an international federation.

CHANCERY PRACTICE.—ENFORCING DECREES AND ORDERS.

Among the many changes effected in the practice and course of procedure in the Court of Chancery during the last twenty years, real improvement is, perhaps, nowhere more discernible than in the practice which now regulates the enforcement of decrees and orders. The following quotation from Lord Bacon's Ordinances presents an illustration of the practice which obtained from 1618 to 1841. "In case of a decree made for the possession of land, a writ of execution goeth forth, and if that be disobeyed, then process of contempt according to the course of the Court against the person to commission of rebellion, and then a serjeant-at-arms by special warrant, and in case the serjeant-at-arms cannot find him or be resisted, upon the coming in of the party and his commitment, if he persist in disobedience, an injunction is to be granted for the possession, and in case that also be disobeyed, then a commission to put him in possession." (See Beames' Orders, p. 6.) Moreover it appears from the old books of practice that formerly no decree of the Court could be enforced until it had been enrolled. When this requirement ceased we are not aware. But in August, 1841, the writ of execution, the writ of attachment with proclamation, and the commission of rebellion, were abolished, and a most important principle was introduced. It was then ruled by general order that a person required by any decree or order to do any act, should, upon being duly served with the decree or order, be bound to do such act in obedience thereto. However, until March, 1859, in all cases where payment of money or delivery of property by a party to a party was directed, the party enforcing the decree was required to prove, not only service of it, but also demand and refusal to obey it. Since March 1859, the demand has also been dispensed with. Again, previously to 1857 a distinction was made between orders in "causes" and orders in "matters" involving, in practice, a far more complicated, dilatory, and expensive course of procedure in "matters" than was necessary in "causes." In July, 1857, that unnecessary and useless distinction was likewise removed. Thus, in enforcing the decrees and orders of the Court, less complicated and expensive and more speedy remedies have been provided.

We think, however, that there are still some cases in which these results have not yet been fully attained, and that the principle to which we have referred may be usefully extended to such cases. At some future time we shall notice to some of such cases. On the present occasion we can only refer to and urge the more extended application of an improvement recently introduced. We allude to the practice under which payment of an amount ascertained upon taxation of a solicitor's bill may now be enforced. Formerly in such cases a remedy by attachment was not available, the order being intitled in a "matter." The only remedies available were by order for committal or by fi. fa. or elegit. And it appears from Appendix C., to the third report of the Chancery Commissioners (1856) that the remedy by committal involved the previous personal service of the taxing master's certificate, and demand of the amount found due, and the obtainment of three orders, two upon motion, and one as of course. And that the remedy by fi. fa. or elegit required that an order be obtained directing payment of the amount found due, and that one month must have elapsed from the date of the entry of such order before execution could be issued to enforce payment. It is obvious that delay and increased expense were the consequence of these requirements. And we remember cases in which compliance with such requirements imposed upon the parties additional payments of large amount. In one case nearly £20 was the amount of the taxed costs of the proceedings taken for the purpose of enforcing payment of the amount which had been previously found due by the taxing master. But during the last two years such inconveniences have been altogether avoided, simply by introducing into the order of reference, after the direction that the amount found due "shall be paid accordingly," the following words:—"within—(a specified time) after service of this order and of the taxing master's certificate to be made in pursuance hereof." Thus enabling parties to enforce payment upon proof of service of the documents specified in the order of reference, and thereby giving a remedy immediate upon the ascertainment of the amount and binding the parties to obedience upon service of the first order,—a course of procedure in perfect harmony with the principle introduced in August, 1841, and applicable, we think, to all cases where costs are ordered to be taxed and paid personally. And we suggested such an assimilation of the practice, chiefly, that, in the analogous cases referred to, the practice may be made to harmonize with the principle upon which the decrees and orders of the Court are now enforceable.

We think, too, that where the Court, under the authority of Rule 37 of Order 40 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 136, in awarding costs, directs payment of a sum in gross in lieu of taxed costs, and directs by and to whom such sum is to be paid, and payment of which may be enforced by process, there payment should be enforced not by subpoena, but in like manner as payment of money is enforceable. We are aware that orders specifying the amount of costs payable are sometimes enforced in the manner suggested; but we believe that in some instances, especially where a time for payment is not limited by the order, a subpoena is issued, and simply for the reason that the amount specified in the order is for "costs." But it appears to us that a subpoena for costs ought not to issue in any case where the amount of costs payable is specified in the order, the requisite authority for sealing the writ not being producible. For "on a subpoena for costs, being sealed, the taxing master's certificate shall be produced to the officer sealing the writ, as his authority for sealing it" (see Rule 1 of Order 38 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 88.)

If it be objected that demand is necessary, we reply that we do not see why it should continue to be so. The rule of Court now dispenses with the demand in cases of money. And why may not costs be regarded as money? Moreover, the subpoena for costs is a writ in the nature of a writ of execution. It gives notice, under seal, of the requirement of the Court, and binds the party to obedience. And it is founded on the same principle as the writ of execution was founded, viz., that disobedience to the mandate of the Sovereign under seal alone constitutes a contempt. Hence we find it stated in one of the old standard books of practice, that "the party is not in contempt till he disobeys the order which commands him to pay costs, and by consequence he must have notice of that by a subpoena (see "Gilbert's Forum Romanum," p. 68). By the 10th of the General Orders issued in August, 1841, (now comprised in Rule 4 of Order 30 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 24,) the writ of execution was abolished, and it was laid down as a general principle that default upon service of the order should bind the party to obedience and afford a sufficient foundation for process of contempt. We have shown that the principle has already been applied to some cases of "costs," and we think that its extension to other cases of "costs" would be equally in harmony with Rule 4 of Order 30.

But we do not propose the abolition of the subpoena for costs. The writ may be required in the cases mentioned in Rule 38 of Order 40 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 136, under which the taxing master may tax without any order of reference, and there may be other cases not now present to our recollection, in which the subpoena may still be useful or necessary. We merely suggest that the salutary improvement already introduced into the practice, should be extended to all cases where costs are ordered to be taxed and paid personally.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

On the motion for the third reading of this Bill, Lord BROUGHAM expressed his earnest hope, that whatever difference of opinion might exist on the subject, the amendments which had been made in the Bill would be accepted by the other House.

The Earl of DERRY: I also hope that a Bill upon this important subject, so long desired by the great body of the commercial community, may pass into law in the present year. The Bill came back from the select committee with considerable alterations, but without any interference with its main principle. The amalgamation of bankruptcy and insolvency; the doing away generally with the distinction between traders and non-traders; and the extension of bankruptcy jurisdiction to county courts; being the three material points, the Bill had come back from the committee without alteration. Now, as this is a Government Bill, and as the Government have accepted in this House every amendment made by the select committee, I think I am entitled to ask whether it is their intention to use the influence which undoubtedly they possess with their colleagues in the other House, and to secure their support and acceptance of the amendments which have been introduced in this House. If, however, the noble earl is not able to give me this assurance, I hope he will state that the objections of the House of Commons to any of these amendments shall be sent up to this House in time to give us an opportunity for the full consideration of any such changes. I do not wish to anticipate that that is the intention of the Government; but I hope the noble earl will be able to say that the Government will accept the Bill as it stands, and will recommend the acceptance of it by the House of Commons, so as thereby to terminate this discussion by the passing of a measure which in the main will, I believe, be very acceptable to all classes of the mercantile community, though there may be a difference of opinion with regard to some of its contents.

EARL GRANVILLE said the noble earl had asked him to assure the House that the Government would adopt the Bill as it now stood, and would press its acceptance upon the House of Commons, and if any alterations were made in the other House that the Bill should be sent back to this House at an early period. Now, it was impossible for him to give such an assurance. The noble earl said that the Government had accepted the alterations made in this House. They had certainly accepted them to this extent—that they had not abandoned the Bill owing to their having been made. No one could be more anxious than the Government were that a Bill should be passed in the course of the present session on this important question. With regard, however, to the assurance which he had been asked for, he could not say more than that the Government would carefully consider the altered state of the Bill; that they would accept it if they deemed it for the public advantage to do so, but that if alterations in it were made by the House of Commons they would endeavour to send it back to this House as quickly as was consistent with the due course of public business.

LORD OVERSTONE said, I will simply say that, in my opinion, by the changes made by the select committee the measure has been materially improved; and, from what I have been able to ascertain of the feeling of the country on the subject, I may venture to say that a large majority of the community are prepared to accept the Bill in its present form as a satisfactory measure, from which they may expect to derive many, if not all, of the beneficial results they are anxious to obtain; and if the Bill should miscarry in the other House of Parliament, through want of faithful support from the Government, I think it will be a great calamity.

LORD LYVEDEN thought the Bill had been altered in the committee very beneficially. On the question of the chief judgeship he had had every wish to support the Government; but, having attended to the matter fairly, he must say he had not heard the shadow of an argument in favour of the appointment of a new judge. Nothing was said in favour of it, and the decision against the proposal was not only that of the majority of the committee, there was nearly unanimity; and it appeared to him to be one of those things in which the House of Commons would hardly venture to say they would be more extravagant than the House of Lords. They had lately been dealing rather extravagantly with the public money, but, as no law lord and none of the lay lords had supported the creation of the new judge, he thought it would be an ungracious act on the part of the House of Commons to attempt to restore it. He hoped her Majesty's Government would give way on the point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, on the subject of the chief judgeship, I must declare that in that respect I think the Bill has been mutilated and deteriorated. But in my opinion the functions assigned to the chief judge cannot be executed without the addition of a judicial power. I believe the appointment of a chief judge would have passed the select committee but for the opposition from a quarter for which I have great respect. Many functions are allotted to the chief judge which cannot be performed without additional judicial strength, and I believe it will be a very great improvement if the chief judgeship is restored.

LORD CRANWORTH and LORD WENSLEYDALE were of opinion that a chief judge was unnecessary.

This Bill was then read a third time and passed.

THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

LORD BROUGHAM, taking advantage of allusion to the subject by the Lord Chancellor, strongly expressed his sense of the un advisability of discussing a legal Bill in the House of Commons, clause by clause, after it had been carefully prepared by professional men.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD. CONCENTRATION OF COURTS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL obtained leave to introduce the following Bills:—

1. Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Wills and Domicile of British Subjects dying in Foreign Countries, and of Aliens dying whilst resident within the United Kingdom.

2. Bill or Bills to provide for the concentration in one place of all the superior courts of law and equity, including the Courts of Admiralty, Probate, Divorce, and Bankruptcy, and the offices connected with such courts, and for the application of certain funds in the Court of Chancery in the purchase of a site for such courts and offices, and the erection thereof.

Thursday, June 20.

In reply to Mr. VANCE,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he had neither had an opportunity of fully considering the Lords' amendments on the Bankruptcy Bill nor of submitting the question to the Government. He thought that a certain time should be allowed to form an opinion on the nature of the amendments, which, as the House was aware, were discussed in a secret committee of the other House. Under these circumstances he could not fix a day for the consideration of the subject, but it would be as early as possible, and he assured the House that he would be guided on this question solely by views of public expediency.

EQUITY.

Re Blanchard, L. J., 9 W. R. 647.

This was an attempt to displace a trustee desirous of continuing in the trust, on the ground of alleged misconduct. The decision shows that such an attempt cannot be made successfully under the Trustee Act. The only section of that Act under which there might appear to be any prospect of success is the 32nd, which enacts that "whenever it shall be expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it shall be found inexpedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, it shall be lawful for the said Court, &c." Lord Justice Turner thought that the language of this section, although very general and extensive, was not adapted to the case before him. At the time when the Act was passed, every trustee had the right to have his accounts taken in court in the presence of all the parties interested, and to have any balance which might be found due to him on the result of the accounts paid, before he was denuded of the trust estate; and except so far as recent legislation may have altered the case as to parties, every trustee has still this right. The Act does not profess to alter the rights of trustees in this respect. Upon this ground the Lord Justice considered that the Act gave no power to remove the trustee, and, therefore, the Court did not enter into the question of his alleged misconduct.

The trustee in this case being a solicitor, a further attempt was made to accomplish his dismissal by calling upon the Court to act in exercise of its general jurisdiction over its officers. But Lord Justice Turner said that the Court would exercise that jurisdiction "only in respect of acts done by a solicitor in that character, or in some relation immediately arising out of it." In the case of Re Aitkin, 4 B. & Al. 47, it had, indeed, been held that, where the employment of an attorney is so connected with his professional character as to afford a presumption that his employment was a consequence of that character, the Court would interfere in a summary way to compel him faithfully to execute the trust reposed in him. In that case, an attorney having been employed by A. to collect and get in the effects belonging to him as administrator of another person, the Court of King's Bench compelled the attorney to render an account to the executors of A. of the monies, &c., received by him, although he had never been employed by A. or his executors to conduct any suit in law or equity on his or their behalf. In the present case the Lord Justice thought that the acts complained of were incidental to the position of a trustee, and not to that of a solicitor, and that the fact of the solicitor having become trustee in consequence of his having been the solicitor could not alter the character of the acts. The result was that a bill must be filed to obtain the removal of this trustee.

AUTHORITY OF CHIEF CLERK IN CHAMBERS.

Re The Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Co., L. J., 9 W. R. 682.

This case is valuable for the distinct assertion made in it of the principle that the suitor is entitled to be heard by the judge himself in chambers, and cannot be compelled to accept a decision of the chief clerk with the opportunity of appeal to the judge in court. This principle, however it may have been departed from in practice in some branches of the Court, was the foundation of the hope that the present system of proceedings in chambers would work better than the superseded system of the Masters' offices; and if the present system has to any extent failed to answer to that hope, the cause has been that the business in chambers has been too much devolved by the judges upon their clerks. In the present case, two parties of shareholders in the above-named company proposed different persons for the post of official manager. The chief clerk of the Master of the Rolls made an order appointing one of them, whereupon a supporter of the other required an adjournment to take the opinion of the judge. This the chief clerk refused, saying that the appointment was made, and that the dissatisfied shareholder must move in court to discharge the order. The solicitor for this shareholder hereupon went before the judge in chambers, and was told by him that his clerk had acted in pursuance of instructions given by himself. A summons was accordingly taken out, and brought on in court, to discharge the order; and in the absence of evidence of unfitness of the person appointed, the judge decided that he would not interfere with his clerk's choice between two persons of assumed equal fitness. It would seem from the history of this case, that in matters pending at the Rolls, there is no appeal at all from the clerk to the judge in chambers, and also that in a large class of questions there is practically no appeal even to the judge in court. It appeared in the course of the discussion, that the Master of the Rolls considered this delegation of a portion of his duty to his chief clerks necessary for the prompt despatch of the business of his court. The Master of the Rolls may be pardoned for believing, if he does believe, that the rapid despatch of business is the best proof of the efficiency of a court of justice. After the long and strong denunciation of the Court of Chancery for its delay, which has been heard during so many years, it is but natural that some, at least, of the authorities of that Court should forget that there is also possible evil in extreme celerity. Certainly, after we have lately seen the Rolls Court closed for want of causes ripe for hearing, it may be permitted to us to doubt whether it is desirable that a judge should refuse to occupy at chambers time which there seems no urgent necessity for him to spend in court. We believe that if the practice in chambers were conducted according to the idea which prevailed when it was originated, the public would not have the slightest reason to begin to think that there are too many judges in the Court of Chancery. The case which has suggested these remarks was brought before the Lords Justices on motion to discharge the order appointing an official manager. Lord Justice Turner said that the result of the proceedings at the Rolls above detailed was "that the comparative merits of the two gentlemen proposed had never been under his Honour's personal consideration, nor had he heard the parties upon the question of appointment." After paying a deserved tribute to the efficient despatch of business at the Rolls, his Lordship used these emphatic words:—"I certainly never can agree that any suitor of the Court has not the right, and the unqualified right, to have his case heard before the judge in person, if he so determines." We may, perhaps, venture to add to this quotation the remark that the right which it affirms is created in the clearest terms by the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, ss. 29, 33, and that the tact and discretion of solicitors may be safely trusted not to abuse this right by wearying the judges with matters which their clerks are fully competent to decide upon.

COMMON LAW.

PRACTICE—ERROR IN FACT, AND ERROR IN LAW.

Carr v. Cooper, Q. B., 9 W. R. 611.

Instances of error in fact seldom occur in practice, as the usual species of error is a mistake in law apparent on the face of the record; and such as might have formed a sufficient ground at the proper time for a motion in arrest of judgment, or a motion for a judgment non obstante veredicto. Error in fact, on the other hand, is some miscarriage in the proceedings: as that the defendant being an infant appeared by attorney and not by guardian; or that the plaintiff or defendant was a married woman when the suit was commenced, her husband not being joined therein.

In the present case, an infant defendant had appeared by attorney, and he now sought to take advantage of this by bringing error after losing the verdict. Upon this, the question arose whether the record could be amended by stating (though contrary to the fact), that the defendant had appeared by guardian. This, the Court said, could not be done, as it would be falsifying the record; but they set aside all the proceedings in the action from the time of appearance without any costs on either side, and directed the defendant to appear by guardian within a specified time.

The moral of this case seems to be, that when there is the least room for doubt, great care should be taken at the outset of the proceedings to ascertain the majority of the defendant; otherwise (as in the present instance), a successful action may be rendered absolutely useless, and the whole battle have to be fought again. There is no question but that in such a case as the present (which by the way was an action for seduction), the protection afforded to infants by the law is productive of considerable injustice.

While upon the subject of error in fact, it may be remarked that the proceedings therein differ in many particulars from those in error in law; for in the first place the memorandum of error delivered to the Master must be accompanied by an affidavit of the fact referred to (15 & 16 Vict., c. 76, s. 158); and in the next place, there must always in the case of error in fact, be an assignment or declaration of error, whereas in law such assignment is only necessary where the other party has given notice to assign; for in other cases (that is where the defendant in error does not rely on some matter of fact), a suggestion of error may be made by the plaintiff immediately after delivering the memorandum, which will make the cause ripe for argument without any further pleadings.

MISREPRESENTATION BY AGENT AS TO EXTENT OF HIS AUTHORITY—WHAT MAY BE RECOVERED AS DAMAGES.

Pow v. Davies, Q. B., 9 W. R. 611.

The foundation for this application was the case of Collin v. Wright (7 Ell. & B. 301), of which an account was given in a preceding volume.* The principle primarily established by that case was that an action might be maintained by A. against B. for representing contrary to the fact (though bonâ fide), that he had authority from C. to conclude an agreement for him; in consequence of which misrepresentation B. suffered damage: and this proposition was afterwards confirmed in the court of error, dissentiente, however, Cockburn, C. J., who considered that to make suit or action lie, the misrepresentation must have been fraudulent. But besides the main question, the case of Collin v. Wright turned also upon what damages could be recovered, supposing the action maintainable by A. against B.: and it was held that A. might recover the expense of certain Chancery proceedings he had instituted against C. in the belief that he was bound by what B. had engaged for as his agent, though it was thought by some of the Court that before commencing such proceedings, notice should have been given to the defendant to ascertain if he persisted that he had authority to contract.

The present case so far resembled Collin v. Wright that it was an action brought by A. against B. for damages arising from B.'s false but bonâ fide representation that he had authority from C. to enter for him into a certain contract with A. But it appeared that A. had, on the faith of B.'s having such authority to grant him a lease for seven years, entered into the occupation of the demised premises (which belonged to C.) and had refused to give them up on request; though there had been no deed given to him by B. as required by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3, for a demise beyond three years. And that under these circumstances, A. had unsuccessfully defended an action of ejectment brought against him by C., the costs of which he now sought to recover from B. But the Court observed that even if B. had had the authority he professed to have had A. could not have successfully defended the ejectment without a deed—and that these costs therefore did not flow naturally out of the defendant's breach of contract, as was the case with regard to the chancery proceedings instituted by A. in the case of Collin v. Wright.

COSTS CANNOT BE RECOVERED IF ALLOWED FOR AS PART OF THE DAMAGES AT THE TRIAL.

Barker v. Clough, B.C., 9 W. R. 618.

The only point really decided in this case (which in its special facts is somewhat complicated), is to be found alluded to in the concluding clause of the marginal note prefixed to the report—namely, that a plaintiff will not be allowed to recover from the defendant in an action for damages, an item of costs in respect of money out of pocket which the jury took into their consideration in assigning the damages. For otherwise, the defendant would have to pay twice for the same matters. Thus, in the present case, the action was brought for wrongfully discharging the plaintiff from the service of the defendant before the expiration of the time for which he was engaged, and the jury gave a certain sum as damages; which sum they intended to include the plaintiff's subsistence money till the end of the period of his engagement, being induced so to calculate the damages by the account given by his counsel as to the terms of the contract. But subsistence money for the same period was also claimed as part of the costs of the action—the plaintiff having been detained in London for the purpose of giving his evidence—and this was allowed by the master.

A rule was now applied for, that this taxation should be reviewed; and it appears to have been admitted on the argument that the justice of the case was with the defendant, but it was urged that the motion had been wrongly conceived, and should have been for a rule to reduce the damages given by the jury, and not to review the taxation. The distinction between the two forms of motion probably affected the aggregate amount of costs, for otherwise there seems no substantial difference. The Court appear to have taken a middle course—they did not make absolute simply the rule which had been obtained for a review of taxation, but they granted an absolute rule that the Master should strike off from his taxation the amount he had allowed for subsistence money.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

FRENCH JURISPRUDENCE.

(By ALGERNON JONES, Esq., Advocate in the Imperial Court of Paris.)

EXECUTION OF ENGLISH JUDGMENTS IN FRANCE AGAINST FRENCH PLAINTIFFS.

The French courts have recently decided a case likely to interest foreigners, a suit between an English company called the English Screw Steam Ship Company, and the liquidators of a French company under the name of Company of the French Clippers and firm of Darnud Ducloux & Co., with reference to the costs of a nonsuit given against the French company in an English court. It appears that the latter company had purchased from the former a certain number of steam vessels for a price which had never been paid, except an earnest of £25,000. The purchasers having, by reason of the winding-up of their company, failed to carry out the contract, the vendors insisted on keeping the £25,000 as indemnity. An action was brought, however, against them in England by the French company to recover the same, in which various questions were raised which caused the issuing of a commission to France to take evidence upon certain questions of French law not material for our purpose, and the case having been brought to trial at the Croydon assizes, the plaintiffs allowed themselves to be nonsuited, and were of course sentenced to pay the costs, which sentence the English company applied to the French courts to obtain execution upon in France. But in the meanwhile the French company had availed themselves of the right which the article of the Code Napoleon gives French claimants against foreign debtors, of suing them before the French courts wherever the cause of action may have accrued, and have cited the English company before the Tribunal of Commerce of Paris, where the latter had allowed judgment to be given against them by default. With this judgment the French Clipper Company attempted to bar the application of the adverse party. They contended that the English judgment which was sought to be executed by the English company, had decided on the merits of the case, that such judgments could not be rendered executory in France without a revision of the merits by a French court, and that the judgment by default of the Tribunal of Commerce was substantially a disapproval of the same. But this theory was rejected by the Tribunal of First Instance of Paris upon grounds with which I cannot but agree, but which were not the only ones which might have been taken to the same effect. The judgments I translate as literally as possible.

"The Tribunal.

"Whereas the English Screw Steam Ship Company produces a judgment given on the 4th of August last by the Court of Queen's Bench at London, and of which they demand the execution.

"Whereas the French Clipper Company reply that subsequently the suit was removed to the French courts, and that they have obtained a judgment favourable to their cause, and that the French courts having to enter into the merits of the foreign judgment before they order the execution thereof, such execution should not be ordered under the circumstances.

"But whereas the English judgment of the 4th of August has not in manner decided on the case itself, but has simply given costs against the then plaintiffs for not having carried out the suit which they had begun; that the costs are only the consequences of their giving up the suit; that such being the case there is no reason why they should not be made executors in France, saving the right of the present defendants to set off such amount as may have been awarded to them by the tribunal of commerce against the said costs.

"For the above reasons, setting aside the various pleas of the defendants, which are so far as necessary rejected, declares executory in France the judgment rendered the 4th of August, 1859, by the Court of Queen's Bench, in London.

"Condemns the Company of French Clippers to the costs, in which shall be included those of translating, stamping, and registering the said judgment."

Upon this an appeal was entered by the French company, and in process of time the cause came on before the First Chamber of the Imperial Courts of Paris, where the appellant's counsel persisted in falling into the mistake which had been committed before the Court below, of treating the matter as if the adverse party had had a defended judgment, and of entirely misunderstanding the nature and effects of a nonsuit, though such a predicament being in the nature of things is to be met with likewise, though under another name in the French practice.

The report as well as the speech of the appellant's counsel exhibits that curious misapprehension and disdain for foreign customs, for which the French, otherwise so apt and intelligent, are very remarkable. Sir Richard Crowder, Knight, is transmuted to Sir Richard Crowder Knight. How facetious the counsel is about our rude and barbaric procedure, somewhat in the strain in which one can imagine one of his celestial majesty's counsel commenting on some institutions of the outside barbarian. Alas! a remembrance of the extended attributions of the circumlocution office in France, and the mazes of red tape and steppes of waste paper in which the French administration bewilders and loses unfortunate suitors, the slight interval which separates some parts of the French procedure, from perfection, and the somewhat qualified admiration with which their criminal law is regarded by such as understand it at all, might have rendered it more indulgent to the shortcomings of others.

"It is well known," said he, "that the law of England is the most obscure and unintelligible thing in the world. One might say as much of the English procedure and English judgments. In the judgment of the 4th of August, there is a statement that a jury is to be called some days hence in the town of Croydon, county of Surrey, to decide the question between the parties. Whatever may be the authority of that judgment, certified by a notary on the declaration of an attorney's clerk, it must be acknowledged that it is inexplicable. There never has been but one case between the parties, and that was decided the 17th of August at Croydon. The Times of the 19th of August gives an account of the long hearing of the case at the Croydon assizes. The contest was so much the reverse of deserted that each party had three counsel. A member of the French bar brought forward to testify to points of French law, was examined by the six counsel during two hours, after having taken an oath and kissed the bible. The contest was animated, and the six counsel spoke most valiantly, so that the suit was anything but undefended or by default."

Fortunately the counsel for the English company, Mr. Lacan had understood and could explain the proceedings in England, and in consequence a judgment on arrêt was given confirmatory of the judgment of the tribunal in the following terms:—

"The Court.—Whereas if it may be held that a Frenchman who has himself brought an action before a foreign court, may even after judgment has been given by the same, bring the cause anew before the French courts, yet it must be acknowledged that in such a case the said French party should support the costs of his original action, which having been unnecessarily brought by him cannot in justice be charged to the other party.

"Whereas in consequence the French Company, whether they have abandoned the suit before the English courts or whether they refuse to carry out its decision, should in either case pay the costs.

"Whereas, on the other hand the decision of the tribunal of commerce given by default against the English company on the new suit brought by the French company, is not by any means in opposition to that of the tribunal of first instance, the first having decided on the original difference between the parties, and the last only on the execution of the English judgment as to the costs; that therefore there is neither lis pendens nor res judicata in the matter.

"Adopting moreover the motives of the first confirms, etc."

The propriety of this decision can hardly be questioned, but as much cannot be said in favour of the dictum with which it starts, that a Frenchman who has himself brought an action against a foreigner before a foreign court, may even after a judgment has been given by that court, bring the suit de novo before the French courts, that proposition, if laid down broadly and without qualification, if not repugnant to natural justice, is highly questionable on the ground of positive law. It is directly in opposition to the great principle of the respect due to contracts, and that which makes the consequence of a contested suit and even the rule res judicata itself a consequence of the implied contract supposed to arise from the fact of joining issue in the judicial conflict. It is fortunately no less contrary to the general current of authority, supported it is no doubt by a judgment of the Royal Court of Paris, of the 22nd of June, 1843, Re the Prince of Capua, in "Devilleneuve and Carotte's Reports," vol. 43, part 2, page 346. But the scope of the doctrine laid down in this case was considerably diminished in the Court of Cassation, which confirmed the decision of the Court of Paris, but by the motive that the suit brought by the Frenchman in a foreign country, had in reality not been ended by the Tribunal to which it had been originally submitted, but had been removed from there and taken to be decided before foreign arbitrators without authority, and the rule that the Frenchman who has been ousted in a suit which he has brought against a foreigner in a foreign court, cannot begin the suit before the French Court, has been laid down by the Court of Cassation in Delamme's Case, "Devilleneuve and Carotte," vol. 28, part 1, page 124, and in Bonneau's Case, likewise in "Devilleneuve and Carotte," vol. 46, part 1, page 474. Many authorities, however, make a distinction which seems highly reasonable, and contend that it is otherwise where at the time the Frenchman began the suit in the foreign country he could not very well do otherwise, as for example when at the time of the commencement of the suit the alien defendant had no property in France. See judgment of the Court of Rouen of 19th July, 1842, "Devilleneuve and Carotte," vol. 42, part 2, page 389; that of Paris of 22nd of November, 1851, "Devilleneuve and Carotte," vol. 51, part 2, page 783. See likewise Anbry and Ran "Cours de Droit Civil," vol. 6, page 815, and "Demolombe," 1—251.

Societies and Institutions.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society, held on Monday the 10th June, 1861, J. F. Macqueen, Esq., Q.C., in the Chair, a paper was read by Mr. WALKER MARSHALL on the subject of Codification.

The learned reader, after referring to the nature of the question, and its interest and importance, thus continued.

Codification, as I understand the word, does not represent the result of the labour of a dictionary maker, or an encyclopædist. The codifier is to be armed not with scissors and paste, but with the pen of a ripe lawyer. He is not to dovetail kindred sections, and tabulate germane statutes; but he is to cast into the crucible of matured experience, and sound sense, and good English, and the best of grammar, the confused, the inconsistent, the redundant, the awkward verbose materials of our statute law; and out of these chaotic ingredients to extract the pure ore of sense and truth.

Year by year, session by session, the legislative chaos has grown, increasing in confusion. It is curious to mark its growth. All the statutes passed in the long reign of Queen Elizabeth occupy but 244 pages of the statutes at large. The labour of any ten years of the Georges is included in a volume of no greater bulk than is produced by each busy session of our present sovereign. When Lord Bacon recommended some sort of digestion of the statutes, they formed in mass not a twentieth part of that huge bulk which they have now attained. If it were a work of expediency then, it is now one of absolute necessity. How much of matter, of real living substance, is there in all these weary wastes of words? Nine parts mere verbiage, mere tautology and surplusage,—repealed, obsolete, superseded, conflicting, repugnant, paragraphs, which remain in the Statute Book as so many false guides, destructive shoals and quicksands, declaring that to be which is no longer.

A cause may be damaged by an exaggerated estimate of the advantages to accrue from an adoption of a particular measure. The cause of codification has received no little detriment from the high-coloured eulogiums in which its great advocate Jeremy Bentham indulged; penetrated with the truth of his deductions, like all original thinkers he was an enthusiast when advancing his discoveries, and glowed with the fervour of his argumentation. Now I at once avow that I do not agree with him in thinking that by any process of codification the science of law can ever be so simplified that he who runs may read, or be rendered intelligible to the uninstructed mind. It must, after codification as before, be an art, it must have its professors,—it will ever require much study and experience to become versed in its principles, to master its language, and be familiar with its rules. But if the reduction of that heterogeneous mass of scattered legislation into a systematic, coherent, and intelligible shape were to render the mastery of the statute law a matter of possibility to him who should honestly apply himself to its study; if lawyers, instead of wasting their lives in ignoble struggles with verbal difficulties, were enfranchised from this debasing servitude, and set at large to apply their faculties in the investigation of the principles and the application of the rules of that science which in the loftiness of its aim and the liberality of its sentiments ought to yield to no other; an immeasurable benefit would be conferred on the profession, and one in which the community at large would participate in a not much inferior degree.

It is difficult to over-rate the extent to which future legislation would be aided by this systematizing of our body of written law. In fact, before any act of legislation can be now accomplished, this process must be gone through as regards that branch to which the legislation is applicable. But this is too often neglected by the framers of Bills, and as a result, there is scarcely any important measure which is not followed by one or more Amendment Acts to cure the perplexities the neglect of this duty has occasioned.

Each matter being relegated to its proper book, chapter, and section of the code, future additions or amendments would without difficulty be assigned to its own proper, natural position. Take, for example, the head of Criminal Procedure. Each enactment at present attaching criminal consequences to an act not previously the object of prosecution has to define the nature and limits of the jurisdiction of the tribunals, original and appellate, the mode of procedure, and the punishment attached. But if all the descriptions of punishment attached to offences were set forth in the code according as they are against the State, against the person, against property, such an Act of the Legislature as I have described would be accomplished by a simple declaration that such an act, accompanied by the criminal intent, should be an offence within such a section of the Criminal Code, and punishable under such other. An amendment would be accomplished by an expurgation of the section, and a substitution of a new one. This process, I believe, applied to our statutes relating to offences, and to those which have reference to matters in which justices of the peace have jurisdiction, would reduce the entire body of our law on this subject to one-tenth of its present dimensions, would obviate a thousand difficulties, and render that perfectly perspicuous which at present is involved in many difficulties, and is attended with endless confusion. The same advantage to future legislation would obtain in every department of the law.

It is scarcely necessary to point out the obvious simplification of the Statute Book which would accrue when subsequent Acts of the Legislature were referred to their appropriate places in the code; and the practitioner, by a simple process of collation, could ascertain at a glance the exact state of the law.

Consolidation, according to the general understanding of that term, meets some of the evils attending the present condition of our statute law, but these by no means the most grave. Our statute law will never be reformed by isolated efforts here and there to huddle under one chapter the scattered provisions which bear reference to a particular subject, leaving the rest in its shapeless condition. To render consolidation of any practical advantage, the entire statute book must be taken in hand from the statute of Merton to the last Bill touched by the sceptre, and everything repealed being expunged, the entire matter must be arranged in a consistent methodical manner. Suppose this accomplished, what advantage would be obtained? Consolidation, I understand, is confined to a simple arrangement of living statutes without interfering with the language in which they are expressed. Well, the advantage would be that which to a great extent would be obtained by a good index. At present the only approach to the statutes is through the medium of text books. Under such a state of affairs they would, to a great extent, be accessible without the aid of text books. But what a strange jumble of styles, of modes of expression, of systems of legislative phraseology, would this present! You might have on the same page a section written in the exhaustive style of Queen Elizabeth, another in the loose and inartistic manner of later times. The leading notion of consolidation is to produce this sort of mosaic—to expunge repealed and obsolete statutes and tabulate what remain, preserving all their vices of expression. Have we any reason to be enamoured with the language in which our laws are expressed? Worse English is not extant; worse English was never penned! Language less adapted to express the object in view it would, in many instances, be difficult to select.

After combating the argument that an alteration of the language might accidentally have the effect of altering the law, the learned reader continued.

I should wish here briefly to refer to an objection which, in this room, has been urged in most forcible language and with much elegance and ability to the adoption of a code—namely, that such a course would involve the enunciation of the unwritten or common law. And it has been urged that much of that breadth of spirit appertaining to unwritten law, much of its adaptability to the varying questions of jurisprudence which advancing civilization and the new combinations of social circumstances consequent thereon introduce, would be lost if the maxims of the common law were reduced into language and thus laid open to the criticism, verbal or grammatical, to which written laws are subject. It appears to me that this objection admits of an answer, perhaps of two or more answers. In the first place, I think a code of English law would be quite sufficiently perfect which omitted these common law maxims.

They might in a code to a great extent be assumed, and as little reduced to writing as they are now. Many of them I think might, without detriment, be incorporated in it. The greater part of these common law principles are nothing more than the natural deductions of sound reasoning applied to the consideration of social questions. I do not see that there would be the slightest advantage in propounding that the language of a document ought to be expounded according to its ordinary signification, unless a contrary intention is shown, or that what a man does through the instrumentality of an agent ought to be regarded as his own act, or that the ratification of an act done for a party's benefit and in his name is an adoption of it from the time it was done, and axioms of that character comprehending a vast amount of the common law principles. Unenlightened reason would arrive at these conclusions. There is nothing conventional in them. There is another branch of the common law to which I will briefly refer, lest it should be supposed I had overlooked it; namely, that which recognizes local customs or the customs of a particular trade. These may be dismissed with this observation, that they would be entirely out of place in a code, inasmuch as they do not constitute universal rules of conduct, but are to be regarded only as giving a particular and peculiar meaning to certain expressions to which general usage attaches a different signification, in which latter sense they constitute rather a grammatical than a legal question; or, where they are local customs, they may be assimilated to a particular tacit contract binding the inhabitants of a special locality with reference to a particular matter of common interest to them, and in either view it would be no more the business of a code to define or meddle with these matters than it would be to express the particular stipulations of contracts of charter party, or the covenants which landlords may exact from their tenants.

Another objection urged against codification of the law is that it would unsettle the law. The argument is this, the language used by the Legislature has received a particular construction in the courts, if you alter that language, even ever so little, you cannot foresee all the results, you cannot tell what interpretation the courts will place upon it. A new field for criticism would be opened, nothing would be known, nothing would be certain, no conduct safe, no rights secure, until the courts in the course of several generations had revised and expounded each article of the code. Such are the fears and such the arguments of the opponents of a code. Are they well founded? Laws expressed in words and written in a style infected with every grammatical vice; laws which in their expression are tautological, frequently inconsistent, sometimes repugnant, almost always without coherence, will always, no matter the number of decisions upon their construction, be open to cavil, to doubt, and criticism. The ingenuity of advocates will ever find exercise in plausible interpretations. A well-expressed law needs no judicial interpretation. It is not improved by receiving such an interpretation, it is not affected by it. If the words aptly express what is intended, no interpreter is required. Whereas a law which from a vice of expression does not express its intent, is never rendered certain by any amount of judicial interpretation, it will always mislead those who are not acquainted with the case or cases upon it, and those who are can never be sure that upon other facts the courts will interpret the statute in a similar spirit, or indeed that another court will so read the law. Examples are not wanting of statutes so admirably expressed that they are a perfectly safe and easy rule of conduct, and admit neither of doubt or cavil. These are statutes which have been prepared by experienced and able lawyers. They have been subjected to precisely the same process to which every branch of our written law would be submitted, in case it were reduced to a code.

The learned reader next referred to the practical bearing of the question, and denying on the one hand the assertion of those who regard it as impracticable, and admitting on the other that it was attended with great difficulties; stated his own opinion to be that it was not merely an undertaking of almost imperative necessity, but also one perfectly possible to be accomplished. In conclusion he said,

I have abstained from any investigation of the circumstances under which the laws of other countries have been reduced to a code, the mode in which it has been accomplished, or the success by which it has been attended. Interesting as such an investigation would be, I have considered that it would rather embarrass than aid this enquiry. With the exception of those states of America which have reduced their laws to a code, the spirit of our law, and the materials out of which the code would be formed, differ widely from these, whether of ancient or modern times, which have been subjected to this process. Our object is not to promulgate a system as in the ancient code of Rome, nor to harmonize the discordant laws of different provinces, as in the modern code of France. We are besides too justly proud of our own system to pursue any other, because other nations have done so; indeed, so much is this the case that with many this kind of reasoning produces disgust, not conviction; and the proposal would be entertained with readier attention if no other nation had done the like.

To conclude, the codification which it seems to me would be necessary to obviate existing evils in the state of our law, consists not merely in reducing to a systematic form the vital statute law, but also in reforming its language, using in the course of this process all the lights to be gathered from the decisions of the Courts, the comments of the learned judges and the recitals of the statutes themselves, so as to embody and express, in exact language, the true intent of the Legislature; adopting, where necessary to the consistency and completeness of the code, the declared rules of the common law, but so as not to exclude those rules where not expressed.

I do not think that we should aim at that exhaustive method which the French Code attempts or has achieved. There should still be left to the courts all those rules of construction, all those applications of common law principles, all that action according to precedent, by which they are now guided, and to their decisions all the authority they now possess. There are, it appears to me, matters beside this question; principles which would enure with as much vitality after our statutes had been subjected to this process as before.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.

The 29th anniversary dinner of this valuable institution which was established in the year 1832, for the purpose of enabling Law Clerks to make provision for themselves and families in time of sickness, old age, or other infirmity, and for their families on their decease, took place yesterday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern.

Sir Hugh McCalmont Cairns, Q.C., M.P., was in the chair, and was supported by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., M.P., R. P. Collier, Esq., Q.C., The Hon. George Denman, Q.C., M.P., W. Forsyth, Esq., Q.C., Mr. Commissioner Nichols, Mr. Southgate, and other members of the equity and common law bars; also by Mr. Keith Barnes, one of the Trustees of the Society, Mr. John Pearson, Mr. R. Fox, Mr. F. George, Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Bell, Mr. Walters, Mr. Young, and other members of the profession.

The cloth having been removed, and the usual loyal and patriotic toasts given,

The Secretary, Mr. H. G. Rogers, read the report of the proceedings of the Society for the past year, which stated that relief had been afforded to members whom illness had disabled from following their employ, to the amount of £362 12s. 6d. In previous years the Society had expended £4,883 16s. 6d. in similar relief, making the total amount paid on account of illness alone £5,246 9s. 0d.

The next branch of expenditure consisted of the allowance made to members when old age or permanent affliction from any cause, and at any period of life, disabled them from earning the means of livelihood. At the last anniversary there were nine members in receipt of this allowance; they still continued so, and two additional claims had been since received and allowed. One of the two new claims arose from affection of the mind in the prime of life. Of those previously existing, six were attributable to the same cause. Two of these eleven members received yearly £31 4s., and the remaining nine, £36 8s. each. They would continue to receive that allowance for life, except in the case of recovery, of which no instance had occurred; and on their decease the family of each would be entitled to a sum of £50. The expenditure on this account during the year had been £362 12s. 6d., and to meet these eleven claims alone, the interest of £13,000 and upwards was required.

The last branch of the Society's expenditure out of the general fund consisted of the allowance made to the families of members on their decease. Eleven members had died since the last anniversary, and to the widows and relations of each the sum of £50 had been paid. Two members, whose wives had died during the same period, had each received the sum of £25. The payments of the year on that account had amounted to £600, and the total expenditure, since 1832, amounted to £7,502 10s.

The receipts during the past year, on account of the general fund, had been £2,161 11s. 3d. (of which the members contributed more than £1,500). The expenditure had amounted to £1,554 3s. 10d., and the surplus receipts had been added to the Society's investments with the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. These investments amounted, on the 2nd day of April, 1860, to the sum of £24,735 9s. 1d., which with interest and some subsequent additions, was increased, at the audit in April last, to £26,267 15s. 6d. The increase, year by year, of the number of claimants for the superannuation allowance, rendered it necessary to keep increasing the amount of those investments. The existing claims required to meet them, the interest of more than half of the present capital of the Society.

The last branch of the Society's expenditure consisted of relief afforded by way of gift of small sums of money out of a fund called the "casual" or benevolent fund, to members, non-members, their widows and children. During the year, thirty-seven applications for pecuniary assistance had been received. After careful investigation and personal inquiry, twenty-six of the applicants were found to be deserving persons in need of the relief sought, and it was granted to them. The relief afforded out of this fund, during the year, had been £432 5s. which, with that of previous years, made the total amount of assistance granted out of that fund alone, £8,582 1s. 0d.

The Society has only been in existence twenty-nine years, but during that period it had paid to members and their families, and expended on casual relief, more than £21,600. In the past year the relief afforded was £1,668 8s. 6d. The claims increased year by year with the age of the Society, rendering necessary constant additions to the invested fund to meet those which, in a few years, were sure to come, and would then have to be met and satisfied.

The Society was under great obligation to the profession for the favourable condition of its funds, and without the aid thus afforded them, the Society could not have expended in relief the large amount which it had done. The satisfactory position which the Society had attained was in a great measure attributable to the kind assistance and liberal support it had received from the profession.

The learned Chairman, in proposing the principal toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the United Law Clerks' Society," said that it appeared to him to be deserving of the utmost support and encouragement from the profession. It created habits of prudence and forethought amongst a class of men in whose welfare and happiness all branches of the profession took a deep interest. The Society made provision for events which must happen to very many of its members, but to whom, amongst so large a body, it was impossible to foresee. It had worked admirably, and the vast amount of good it had done might be well appreciated from the fact that since its establishment it had expended the large sum of £21,000, and upwards, in affording relief of a very important character, not only to its members and their families; but also to those who were not members and their families; it had soothed the pillow of the sick and weary, and alleviated the anguish of the widow's grief. This society had made greater provision for future claims upon it than most societies of a similar character, which, when they had attained a similar longevity to this, had not, through want of proper foresight, been able to meet those contingencies against which it was absolutely necessary provision should be made in order that permanency should be attained. He considered it a great feature in this society that it afforded relief to those who had no other claim upon it than that they belonged to the same body, and were in need of assistance. Such generosity was sure to meet its reward, and it had done so; and it appeared to him that as the society had enlarged its benevolence, its prosperity had increased. The society, from the importance of its objects, and the excellence of its management of the funds placed at its disposal, had earned for itself a right to the approval and support of all branches of the profession. The learned gentleman concluded by making an eloquent and earnest appeal to those present to contribute largely to the funds of the society, and thus to show their approval and appreciation of its objects.

Mr. John Pearson proposed "The Lord Chancellor and the other patrons of the Society," which was responded to by Mr. Forsyth, Q.C.

The toast of "The Chairman" was proposed by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, who passed a high eulogium upon the great ability and learning of the hon. gentleman. The toast met with a very cordial reception.

The learned Chairman returned thanks.

"The Bench, the Bar, and the Profession," was proposed by Mr. Collier, Q.C., in a very able and eloquent speech, and was responded to by the Hon. George Denman.

Some other toasts having been given, the meeting separated.

The appeal made by the chairman was warmly responded to, the subscriptions announced by the secretary amounting to £450.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES.—TENTH EDITION.

This day is published, in One thick 8vo. Volume, price 18s. bound in cloth,

A DICTIONARY OF DATES

RELATING TO ALL AGES AND NATIONS; FOR UNIVERSAL REFERENCE:

Comprehending Remarkable Occurrences, Ancient and Modern, the Foundation, Laws, and Government of Countries—their Progress in Civilisation, Industry, Literature, Arts, and Science—their Achievements in Arms—and their Civil, Military, and Religious Institutions, and particularly of the British Empire.

BY JOSEPH HAYDN.

TENTH EDITION, REVISED AND GREATLY ENLARGED, BY BENJAMIN VINCENT,

Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library, of the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

In this the Tenth Edition the chronological tables have been revised and continued; about four hundred new articles have been inserted, and a large number of others re-written; the important dates have been compared with recognized authorities; and much biographical, geographical, literary, and scientific information has been supplied. To afford room for these additions, many articles have been condensed, and matters of less importance have been either printed in smaller type or excluded. The utility of the Index has been increased by the insertion of dates.

"A volume containing upwards of 15,000 articles, and, perhaps, more than 15 times 15,000 facts. What the London Directory is to the merchant, this 'Dictionary of Dates' will be found to be to those who are searching after information, whether classical, political, domestic, or general."—Times.

SELECTIONS FROM THE WORK.

ELECTRICITY.

From the Greek elektron, electron, amber. The electrical properties of rubbed amber are said to have been known to Thales, 600 B.C. See Magnetism.

FRICTIONAL OR STATIC ELECTRICITY.

The Leyden jar (vial or bottle), discovered by Kleist, 1745; and by Cuneus and Musschenbroek, of Leyden, Winkler constructed Leyden battery 1746

Desaguliers classifies bodies as electrics and non-electrics 1742

Important researches of Watson, Canton, Beccaria, and Nollet 1740-7

Franklin announces his theory of a single fluid, terming the vitreous electricity positive, and the resinous negative, 1747; and demonstrates the identity of the electric spark and lightning, drawing down electricity from a cloud by means of a kite June 1752

Beccaria publishes his researches on atmospheric electricity, 1758; and Lapinus his mathematical theory 1759

Electricity developed by fishes investigated by Ingenhousz, Cavendish, and others about 1773

Lichtenberg produces his electrical figures 1777

Electro-statics: Coulomb applies the torsion balance to the measurement of electric force 1793

Electro-Chemistry—water decomposed by Cavendish, Fourcroy, and others 1787-90

Discoveries of Galvani and Volta (see Voltaic Electricity) 1791-3

Ersted, of Copenhagen, discovers electro-magnetic action (see Electro-Magnetism) 1819

Thermo-electricity discovered by Seebeck; it was produced by heating pieces of copper and bismuth, soldered together, 1823; the thermo-electrometer invented by Snow Harris, 1827; the thermo-multiplier constructed by Melloni and Nobili 1831

MISCELLANEOUS.

LUCIA, ST. (West Indies). First settled by the French in 1690. Taken by the British several times in the subsequent wars. Memorable insurrection of the French negroes, April, 1793. In this year Guadaloupe, St. Vincent's, Grenada, Dominica, St. Eustatius, and St. Lucia, were taken by the British. St. Lucia was restored to France at the peace of 1802; but was again seized by England the next year, and confirmed to her by the treaty of Paris in 1814. See Colonies.

LUCIFER MATCHES came into use about 1834. In March, 1842, Mr. Reuben Partridge patented machinery for manufacturing the spindles. In 1848 Schrötter of Vienna made known his amorphous phosphorus, by the use of which lucifers are rendered less dangerous and the manufacture less unhealthy.

LUCKNOW, the capital of Oude. See India, 1857.

LUDDITES. Large parties of men, under this designation, commenced their depredations at Nottingham, breaking frames and machinery, Nov. 1811. Skirmish with the military there, Jan. 29, 1812. Several serious riots occurred again in 1814; and numerous bodies of these people, chiefly unemployed artisans, committed great excesses in 1816, et seq.

COTTON.

A vegetable wool, is the produce of the Gossypium, a shrub indigenous in the tropical regions of India and America. Indian cotton cloth is mentioned by Herodotus, was known in Arabia in the time of Mahomet, A.D. 627, and was brought into Europe by his followers. It does not appear to have been in use among the Chinese till the 13th century; to them we are indebted for the cotton fabric termed sankeen. Cotton was the material of the principal articles of clothing among the Americans when visited by Columbus. It was grown and manufactured in Spain in the 10th century; and in the 14th century was introduced into Italy. India muslins, clintzes, and cottons were so largely imported into England in the 17th century, that in 1700 an act of parliament was passed, prohibiting their introduction: their cheapness and excellence interfering with the linen and silk manufactures. Cotton has now become the staple commodity of England, as wool was in the time of Edward III. About 1841, the "cotton" or "Manchester" interest began to obtain political influence, which led to the repeal of the corn laws in 1846. See Calico, Muslin, &c.

PROGRESS OF THE COTTON MANUFACTURE IN ENGLAND.

Fustian and Velvet made of cotton about 1641.

Calico, Sheeting, &c. The fly-shuttle was invented by John Kay, of Bury, 1738; the drop-box, by Robert Kay, 1760; spinning by rollers (also attributed to John Wyatt), patented by Lewis Paul, 1738; the spinning jenny, by Hargreaves, 1767; the water-frame, by Arkwright, 1769; the power-loom, by Rev. D. E. Cartwright, 1785; the dressing machine, by Johnson and Radcliffe, 1802-4; another power-loom, by Horrocks, 1803-13.

British Muslin (totally superseding that of India) is due mainly to the invention of the Mule (which see) by Samuel Crompton, 1774-9; and to the self-acting mule of Mr. Roberts, 1825.

Calico Printing commenced 1764.

The Steam-Engine first applied to the cotton manufacture (by Boulton and Watt), 1785.

Bleaching by means of chloride of lime introduced by Mr. Tennant, of Glasgow, 1799.

Stockings. The stocking-frame was invented by William Lee, in 1589. Cotton stockings were first made by hand about 1730; Jedediah Strutt obtained a patent for Derby ribbed stockings in 1759; and Horton patented his knitter frame in 1776; Crompton's mule was employed in making thread for the stocking manufacture about 1770.

Cotton Lace—Bobbin-net. The stocking-frame of Lee was applied to lace-making, by Hammond, about 1768; the process perfected by John Heathcoat, 1809.

LONDON, JUNE 29, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The unexpected death of Lord Chancellor Campbell created considerable excitement on Monday last at Lincoln's Inn, where, for some hours, a large number of barristers and solicitors, and others connected with the profession, were to be seen in groups about the courts discussing the numerous rumours to which the melancholy event gave rise. There appeared to be but little doubt from the first that Sir Richard Bethell must succeed without further delay to the distinguished office for which his pre-eminent abilities and professional position had long marked him out. There was a slight rumour, however, that either the Master of the Rolls or Vice-Chancellor Wood was not unlikely, for some reason or other, to be promoted to the honours of the woolsack, in preference to Sir Richard Bethell; and even Chief Justice Cockburn was mentioned as a probable competitor. But notwithstanding these flying reports, Lord Palmerston seems to have had no hesitation in making his choice; for it was well known on Tuesday that the appointment of Sir Richard Bethell was then definitively settled. Few men have ascended the woolsack with such universal approval on the part of the entire profession; and no Lord Chancellor ever commenced his chancellorship with a greater reputation. Either as a lawyer, an advocate, a statesman, or a scholar, Lord Westbury need fear comparison with none of his predecessors. He is, and long has been, facile princeps of the equity and, indeed, of the entire English bar. It would, therefore, have been a matter of the utmost surprise, both to the profession and the general public, if any other appointment had been made; and the equity bar in particular would have had the gravest cause of complaint if another common lawyer had been promoted to the highest judicial seat in the Court of Chancery. Lord Westbury was sworn in before the Master of the Rolls and the other equity judges on Thursday morning at Lincoln's Inn, and an unusually great crowd of members of the profession, amongst whom but one feeling prevailed, which was that Ministers would have acted wrongly if they had appointed any other successor of Lord Campbell. There was no one present that I do not feel that Lord Westbury was only stepping into the position which had long been assigned to him by the unanimous voice of the profession and the country at large.

A curious and unprecedented question of jurisdiction has been raised by the death of Lord Campbell. The only other instance on record of a Lord Chancellor dying while charged with the actual custody of the Great Seal was that of Sir Charles Yorke (the son of Lord Hardwicke), who committed suicide the day after he received the Great Seal, but before he had applied it to his own patent of peerage, or assumed the duties of the office. The question to which we refer, however, could only arise since the institution of the second appellate court in chancery—being whether the Lords Justices, while the Great Seal was in abeyance, had any jurisdiction in Chancery or in Lunacy? On Monday morning, before the time for their lordships to take their seats, this point was a good deal discussed amongst the groups of lawyers whom the news of the Chancellor's death had brought together. The general opinion was that the Lords Justices had, under the statutes relating to lunacy, a substantial and independent jurisdiction, which was not affected by a vacancy in the chancellorship; but there was considerable doubt as to whether their jurisdiction in equity was not in abeyance until the appointment of a new Lord Chancellor. The Lords Justices sat in their private room on Monday, and disposed of their paper of lunacy petitions, and on the two following days which preceded the appointment of Lord Westbury, their lordships heard appeal causes as usual. But upon taking their seats in their private room, Lord Justice Knight Bruce stated that the Lords Justices, having considered the question of their jurisdiction, entertained no doubt that it remained unaffected not only in Lunacy, but in Chancery. His Lordship, nevertheless, at the same time intimated that if the new Lord Chancellor should entertain a doubt upon the subject, any difficulty might be removed by pro forma orders after the Lord Chancellor was appointed.

We understand that the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and several important country law societies, including those of Liverpool and Manchester, have presented to Sir Cresswell Cresswell memorials against the new general order and table of fees affecting the common form business of the district registries of the Court of Probate. Our readers will probably remember the account which we gave on a former occasion of this general order, and of the oppressive and unjust effect upon the business of the country solicitors which it is calculated to produce. When her Majesty's Court of Probate was originally established, district registrars were allowed to act as the solicitors of parties requiring business to be done in their districts; but the registrars were in the habit of charging, in addition to the fees paid to Government, the ordinary costs which they would be entitled to receive as private solicitors. The recent order of Court, however, has converted all these officers into Government lawyers. They are, henceforth, to receive certain increased but fixed salaries, and in consideration of the increase are to prepare, as quasi solicitors, and quasi professional advisers, affidavits and other necessary documents, for parties applying in person for grants of probate or letters of administration—the Government finding for such clients not merely lawyers and offices, but clerks and all other necessary appliances for conducting correspondence and the business of solicitors; and all this is to be done at the profit or loss (as the case may be), of the public; but for what useful purpose no one has yet attempted to show. As a matter of fact, the fees to be taken in the district registries, when applications are made by parties in person (in addition to the ordinary fees), are about one-half the fees that, under another order of the Court, are payable to regular practitioners. Thus, the Government, while imposing special and burdensome taxes upon solicitors, enters into a grossly oppressive and unjust competition with them for a class of business in which, above all others, it is important for the public interest to have their intervention. We pointed out in our former article the embarrassment which is likely to beset the Government, and the risk to public as well as disappointment and vexation to the suitor which are certain to arise from the responsibility of district registrars for laches or mistakes made in discharge of the semi-official class of business to which we refer. But apart from any considerations of this kind, we cannot conceive upon what ground it has been thought prudent or just for the Government to establish in this manner with the public money, and at the public risk, so large a number of speculative law agencies throughout the country, a proceeding not only opposed to common justice and good sense, but which is in direct opposition to the established principles of political economy, and to the most marked tendency of modern legislation. It is, moreover, characterised by a special injustice, and a wanton breach of an implied contract with the legal profession. When the Probate Bill of 1857 was passing through Parliament, it was distinctly understood that the amount of compensation to be granted to the proctors was to be reduced in the proportion which it was considered they would be gainers by being allowed to practise in the general business of solicitors, and such reduction was accordingly made; but no compensation whatever was given for the necessary loss sustained by solicitors through the admission of the proctors; because it was said that the solicitors would be large gainers by being allowed to transact the great mass of the common form business of the country; and upon this pretence their mouths were stopped. The effect of the recent order will be to deprive them of perhaps nine-tenths of the non-litigious business of the probate registries in the provinces, and with no other apparent result whatever than to enable the Government either to make a profit, or to entail upon it a loss; as well as a great responsibility in transacting the entire probate business of the whole country, excepting the metropolis.

The concentration of courts scheme, as embodied in the Bill which will be found elsewhere in our columns, has already received, as it deserves, the support of a large number of solicitors in the metropolis and throughout the country. Numerous petitions to Parliament are now in course of signature in favour of the measure. The general grounds alleged are that the petitioners, on behalf of such of their clients as are suitors in the superior courts of law and equity, are deeply interested in promoting the Government scheme—the present courts and offices for the administration of justice in London being scattered in different directions, some of them being very inconvenient in their situation, and being, moreover, ill-constructed and without sufficient accommodation. The following reasons in support of these Bills have been printed and circulated amongst members of Parliament:—"The object of the two Bills now before Parliament is to carry into effect the Report of Commissioners appointed by her Majesty to inquire into the expediency of bringing together the courts of law and equity, and for providing a site, and for erecting suitable buildings, as recommended by the Commissioners. The first of such Bills is for the purpose of procuring a site approved of by the Commissioners, which it is proposed shall be vested in her Majesty's Commissioners of Works, and become national property. The second Bill is for the purpose of defraying the costs of purchasing the site, and of erecting new buildings for the courts of justice, and to appropriate for that purpose funds which have arisen partly from surplus fees and partly from profits made by courts of justice with suitors' uninvested cash, upon a Parliamentary guarantee against loss of existing income. A petition has been presented by the Treasurer of Lincoln's-inn on behalf of himself and the masters of the bench of the said society against the Bills, and for the purpose of having the equity courts erected upon ground in Lincoln's-inn, the private property of the benchers and members of the inn, who offer to erect buildings for the equity courts upon being secured a rental of £4,000 per annum. The Commissioners of the Crown have not recommended this plan, which is open to serious objections. In a great country like England, the nation should possess buildings of its own for courts of justice, and not be tenants to a private body. The building proposed to be erected by the Board of Works will provide distinct courts with proper accommodation, and, as ample funds exist for carrying into effect the views of the Commissioners, there is no necessity whatever for departing from the plan recommended by them. The funds to be taken are surplus monies, arising from fees levied upon the suitors, and profits arising from suitors' uninvested cash, which have not been applied in payment of salaries, and other expenses; Parliament by annual grants for courts of justice having rendered it unnecessary to apply such funds. The purchase of the site, and erection of the buildings can, under the proposed Bills, be speedily carried into effect. The proposal of the benchers of Lincoln's-inn is also objectionable as tending further to increase the rentals of chambers within the inn, the price of which at present is so high as to prevent many of the junior members of the bar from occupying them; and the proposed site of the benchers can with advantage to themselves and to the profession be taken for the erection of chambers, which will acquire additional value from their proximity to the proposed new courts."

Mr. George Coode, a gentleman who was employed some years ago by the Statute Law Commission, and whose acquaintance with the subject of Statute Law Consolidation entitles to respect whatever he may have to say on the subject, has published a letter to Lord Palmerston on the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills. He complains bitterly that after twenty-eight years of preparation and an expenditure of £60,000, no legislative result in actual consolidation should yet be visible. He characterizes the Bills now before Parliament as "a mere delusion in themselves," and, what is worse, "the most effectual obstacle if they should pass to any future consolidation of the law." The plan of these Bills he describes to be "that of picking out the similar or identical parts from all different subjects, and stringing all those similar parts together in one Bill," without any regard to the natural connection between those parts and the "organic wholes" from which they are separated. Mr. Coode lays down and forcibly illustrates the proposition that there is no consolidation possible by the aggregation of similar parts; but that "the collection of similar parts is necessarily destruction and disintegration of the subjects from which those parts are taken." He says that all these Bills "consist exclusively of clauses wholly unconnected the one with the other and only brought together by the single fact that they are, every one of them, connected with a penalty." Every one of them, he adds, "is a penal fragment torn from its organic connection with the rights and duties with which it is legally, systematically, and logically connected." Mr. Coode's brochure is very ably written and makes out a strong case in support of his position. It is, moreover, a complete vindication of the evidence which he gave before the Select Committee, 1857, on the Statute Law Commission. Every attempt hitherto made at the reformation of our statute book has been of a merely empirical character. Mr. Coode has for years laboured hard, but ineffectually, to import science or at least forethought into the work; and after all the time lost and vast sums of money expended in the preparation of the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills, we fear that he has only too well shewn the fallacy of the method on which the attempt to consolidate the entire Criminal Law has proceeded. It is not unlikely, however, that these Bills will become law during the present session, as after all that the Government has said about law reform, something must be done to rescue the session from complete barrenness in this respect, and these Bills appear to be the main hope of the Government for this purpose.

THE LATE LORD CHANCELLOR.

The news of Lord Campbell's death was heard by all lawyers with profound regret. With unimpaired power, untiring industry, and unflagging zeal, he seemed, at the age of nearly fourscore years, to defy the hand of time, and to know neither disease, weakness, nor the desire for repose. For seventy years he had led, as boy and man, a life so active and laborious, that probably he had neither the wish nor the capacity for the retirement which might have prolonged his days. The habit of work was too deeply rooted in his nature for any change except that awful one which has now removed him from the busy haunts of men to the dark silence of the grave. If a political vicissitude had interrupted his judicial labours, he would have returned to those literary pursuits in which he had formerly found a fresh source of pleasure, as well as a new road to fame. It may be that he overtasked his strength by what he did; but he escaped, by doing it, the burden, which probably he could not have borne, of leisure. It was his nature to toil as long as he lived. He has worked for wealth, for honour, and for amusement; and he has attained successively to all the objects which he had proposed. His career has been that of a strenuous, self-reliant man. He fought his way through poverty and obscurity to the highest honour of the State. He made the most, in every way, of a long life, a vigorous constitution, and a powerful mind. He died—to use an expressive phrase—in harness. In spite of his apparent youthfulness both of mind and body, he must have felt the silent warning which old age gives to prepare for death. The suddenness of the blow caused deep emotion in the profession of which he was the head; but now that it has fallen, reflection shows that it can scarcely be called untimely.

The character of Lord Campbell's mind and the range of his talents and acquirements have become fully known to the public during his long career. The latest, and therefore the strongest, impression on the minds of lawyers who practised in his court was probably that of admiration at the unsparing diligence with which he performed his duties as a judge in equity. In the Times of Monday last we read in the usual law report that on this day week he had heard an appeal from one of the Vice-Chancellors. "At the conclusion of the argument the Lord Chancellor reserved his judgment." If that industrious life had been prolonged, there would have been ready in the course of a few days a carefully composed judgment of which every word, not only of reasoning, but of quotation of evidence or of cases, would have been fairly written out in the late Chancellor's own hand. That judgment, after having been read in court, would have been placed at the disposal of the reporters, and would have been printed for the information amongst others of our own subscribers. With long experience, with extensive knowledge, and with a shrewd intelligence, it was impossible that this industrious judge should do otherwise than well any sort of judicial business which he might take in hand. Yet it is only natural that Lord Campbell should have made, as we think he did, a more distinguished figure in the Court of Queen's Bench than in the Court of Chancery. We believe it may be truly said that his judgments in equity were satisfactory and his judgments at law were admirable. It must not, however, be supposed that there was any appearance in Lord Campbell of a deficiency in knowledge of the peculiar jurisprudence of the court in which he lately sat. The writer of the lives of the English Chancellors was not likely to have omitted to peruse their judgments. For several years he held no judicial office while he had good reason to expect that the Great Seal would some day be his. It would be contrary to all that we know of Lord Campbell's character to suppose that he did not do all that could be done in this interval of leisure to qualify himself to hold with credit the highest place to which his ambition could aspire. Yet the best years of his life and the most earnest exercise of his powers were devoted to the exclusive study and practice of the common law. He naturally attained to the highest proficiency in the pursuit to which he gave himself most thoroughly. He did many things well, but that which he did very well he did in the seat where during a long course of previous years the doings of Lord Ellenborough and Lord Tenterden had been watched by his observant eye. We intend no disparagement to his later labours when we say that the fairest monument of his fame exists in the volumes of the Queen's Bench Reports. Neither as an author nor as an advocate nor as a speaker in either House of Parliament nor as a judge in equity, did he do more than show that a determined purpose and intense application will go far to compensate for the want of genius, of general education and of peculiar training. When we attribute to Lord Campbell a want of general education, we do not, of course, forget that he had the opportunity of learning, and that he would be sure to learn thoroughly, whatever a Scottish university could teach him up to the completion of his nineteenth year. But we think that the general education of every lawyer might be advantageously prolonged beyond that period, and we also think that a lawyer who becomes Lord Chancellor is likely to illustrate in a remarkable manner the utility of such a rule. There was no want in the speeches and writings of Lord Campbell of what are often taken as proofs of the completeness of education. There were quotations from the classics, and from modern writers in prose and verse, and when he dealt with legal questions he could quote from the jurists of other times and countries. But in general when he made a display of learning he rather damaged his reputation than improved it, through the impression he was apt to produce that the learning had been got up for the occasion. Probably he could have mastered any subject at short notice as well as any man that ever lived, but his versatility and energy produced results more astonishing than agreeable to a critic's eye. It was in the work for which he was best fitted, and in which he had laboured longest and most strenuously, that he achieved indisputable eminence. The success of Lord Campbell as head of the Common Law was as complete as that of Lord Cottenham when first he presided in the Court of Chancery.

Readers whose experience goes back far enough, may remember the droll contrast between the strained ambitious eloquence of Sir John Campbell for the plaintiff in a nisi prius trial, and the quiet, easy, conversational address of his father-in-law (Sir James Scarlett) for the defendant. Readers who count fewer years of life will call to mind how often Lord Campbell got the worst of it in wordy controversy from Lord Abinger, and afterwards from Lord Brougham and Lord Lyndhurst, in the House of Peers. We have none of us forgotten that odd propensity to speak from the judicial bench as if for the applause of the crowd in court which, both in the Queen's Bench and in Chancery, Lord Campbell seemed unable to control whenever an opportunity presented itself for a little burst of popular declamation. In those early days when the now deceased Chancellor sat in judgment upon the merits of new plays, he might have called the sort of talk to which he afterwards became inclined, fustian. If he had had either a fine natural taste, or the opportunity for extensive study of the best models of eloquence, such a tendency would have been impossible. Perhaps Lord Campbell was as great a lawyer as Lord Lyndhurst; but as an orator he was immeasurably his inferior. Yet his eloquence, though neither graceful nor sublime, sufficed at the Bar to persuade juries, and on the bench to express his meaning. If we recall the memory of his trivial failings, it is in no unkindly spirit, but in order to place before our readers the full picture of a distinguished and lamented judge. Even if the blemishes were more considerable than they are, they would be more than compensated by the simple fact that the son of a poor Scotch minister rose, by sheer force of will, to be Lord Chancellor. In an age which honours above all things success, Lord Campbell was a most successful man. If, on comparison with some of the greatest among his rivals, he appears deficient either in innate genius or in large mental culture, he deserves the higher admiration for having, by industry and sagacity, made the conditions of the race for fame so nearly equal. At the present moment, when it is barely a week since he sat in court and cabinet, and when the whole profession still feels the shock of his sudden death, it is impossible to speak of his career and its termination except in language of respect and sorrow. With all his faults, he was an eminent example of the qualities, moral and intellectual, by which his countrymen attain wealth and honour, and by which, in peace and war, at home and abroad, they enhance the greatness and secure the power of the United Kingdom.

CHANCERY PRACTICE—ENFORCING DECREES AND ORDERS.

Reference was made in a previous article to certain provisions of the practice introduced in August, 1841, (now comprised in Rule 4 of Order 30 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 94), and under which the person required by any decree or order to do any act shall upon being duly served with such decree or order be held bound to do such act in obedience thereto. It will be remembered that the principle introduced in August, 1841, was introduced substitutionally for the writ of execution of a decree or order,—and we think that its application might be usefully extended to all cases where the writ issuing in execution of a decree or order is merely a repetition of the mandate of the Court under seal, and is directed to the party. In the present article we shall urge its application to one of such cases, premising a few words only with reference to the principle itself. We do not presume to say that the principle upon which the writ of execution was founded was overlooked when such writ was abolished and other provision made in lieu thereof,—but we think that such provision would have been more completely substitutional, or, at least, that the principle upon which the writ of execution was founded would have been more distinctly preserved, if the seal of the Court had been required to the endorsement by which notice is given to the party served with the decree or order of the liabilities consequent upon disobedience. In the old standard books of practice it is repeatedly asserted that to constitute a contempt there must be disobedience to the mandate under seal of the Sovereign. This agrees with the language of the writ of attachment still in use which speaks of a contempt "committed against us." In Brydall's "Jus Sigilli, or the law of England touching the king's four principal seals," (1673, p. 3.) it is said "the king is, in intendment of law, a corporation, and therefore passeth nothing firmly but under the Great Seal," and (p. 120,) "the Great Seal is a signification of the king's commandment." Harrison, in his Chancery Practice, vol. 2, p. 177, says, "it is a very old but a true saying that no offence can be committed but where the Great Seal is showed the party." In Wyatt's Chancery Practice, p. 135, it is stated that "under the old practice the party was to be served with the order under seal before he could be brought into contempt." In Hudson's treatise of the Court of Star Chamber, comprised among the tracts in the "Collectanea Juridica," vol. 2, p. 146, we read the following:—"It is the seal which requireth the obedience;" and Gilbert, in his "Forum Romanum," p. 65, says, "No subsequent process can be formed but upon a contempt to the Great Seal, which is the royal authority." All these writers, therefore, agree in maintaining the supremacy of the Sovereign as the head of the Court of Chancery, and in asserting that it is disobedience to the mandate of the Sovereign under seal which constitutes a contempt. It will, perhaps, be said that general orders made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament which has received the royal assent are equivalent in authority to a "signification of the King's commandment" under seal. Even if it be so, we still think that the principle upon which contempts were founded would have been more distinctly preserved if the seal of the court had been affixed to the requirement made upon the party.

was intended substitutionally for the old writ of execution of a decree or order. We now proceed to urge the application of such principle to orders for injunctions—and in doing so, it may be useful to glance at a few points concerning the writ of injunction. The origin of the writ is evidently very remote. It seems to have been in very frequent use in former times for the purpose of effectuating the decisions of the Court, and, in many cases, to have preceded process of contempt. We learn from the works of writers on the history and practice of the Court, that in ancient times the King himself personally administered justice in his Court of Chancery, and that the plaintiff and defendant appeared personally before the King, and presented their complaint and defence, and that the mandate of the King thereupon was expressed not in any formal order, but by writ under the Great Seal;—and that in some cases the writ, when enrolled, became at once the record of the complaint and the judgment of the Court thereupon. In course of time, however, when the Lord Chancellor officiated as the King's deputy in the Court of Chancery, the judicial decision of the Court was expressed in a formal order; but the King's mandate under seal was necessary to give effect to the order made, and to bind the party to obedience. Hence the writ in execution of the order was retained—and probably the writ of injunction was one of such writs. The writ of injunction is certainly a repetition of the mandate of the Court under seal, and is issued in execution of the order of the Court. It is, indeed, spoken of as a writ of execution by a learned writer on the subject (see Eden on Injunctions, pp. 2 and 36). And as the writ of execution of a decree or order is now abolished, we think that the writ of injunction in execution of a restraining order might be dispensed with. And there is much connected with injunctions both of established principle and practice which favours the suggestion. For instance, an injunction is not necessarily preventive only, it may be judicial, requiring a party to do a particular thing. (See Eden on Injunctions, pp. 2 and 36, and, Daniell's Chancery Practice, 3rd ed. vol. 2, p. 1209.) And, moreover, it is well understood in practice that an injunction is binding from the moment it is pronounced, especially if the party restrained is then present in court;—and that any person guilty of a breach of the injunction may be committed as readily and as effectually before service of the writ, as after service. Eden says (p. 75) "An injunction is an order of Court, and must be obeyed." He admits that the order of the Court is more usually enforced by means of the process of the writ of injunction (p. 290) but he at the same time intimates that that is only one of the forms or modes by which an injunction under order is enforced, and adds the following:—"Interlocutory orders enjoining parties are frequently made, and the Court treats the neglect or disobedience of all orders as a contempt, and enforces obedience by imprisonment," and, further, "the object sought is equally attained by a restraining order as by a writ."

It may be objected that rule 4 of order 30 (p. 94 of the Consolidated General Orders) applies to cases where the order requires a party to do an act, and that under rule 10 of order 23 (p. 78) the order must state the time or the time after service within which the act is to be done, and that, therefore, the provisions of such rules are not applicable to orders which require a party not to do an act—and in which, in the nature of the case, a time cannot be limited as required by rule 10 of order 23. We have said that an injunction is not necessarily preventive only. But there might be force in the objection if the remedy by attachment were the remedy available in cases where there is a breach of the order, or if the liability of the party to committal were dependant upon the service of the order. Such, however, is not the case. The rules in question are not, of course, literally applicable to restraining orders, but we think that the principle involved in rule 4 of order 30 is applicable to such orders. Such rule simply lays down the principle by which disobedience to an order of the Court is to be determined;—and provides that, in lieu of the writ of execution, service of the order itself shall be the test of obedience. And it appears to us that, so far as the requirement of obedience is concerned, the test is, upon the principle involved in rule 4, as applicable to restraining orders as to other orders. And the writ of injunction being a writ in execution of the order of the Court affords an additional reason in favour of the application of such test, to such orders.

But the penalty inserted in writs of injunction deserves notice. It seems now to be regarded as purely formal,—and the amount inserted in the writ is only arbitrarily determined. Double the supposed value of the property in question between the parties is usually inserted. In former times fines were pronounced by the Lord Chancellor in open court, and estreated into the Hanaper by special order, and in some cases the penalties mentioned in writs were, upon disobedience, estreated into the King's Exchequer, or levied by the sheriff under process from the petty bag, and paid into the Hanaper. Whether or not the penalties in writs of injunction were at any time thus regarded and dealt with, or awarded as damages to the injured party, we do not know. Certainly for many years past the imposition of the liability to the penalty seems to have had no other object than that of holding the party to obedience, and we know of no instances in which the penalty has been levied or in any way enforced. Breach of an injunction has almost from time immemorial been regarded as a contempt and punishable, and punished as such—at one time by attachment, but for very many years past by immediate committal. However, if necessary, a penalty might still be imposed upon the party restrained.

There may be other points deserving consideration, in connection with the writ of injunction, which we have not noticed, but our remarks will probably suffice to draw attention to the subject. And to put our remarks into practical form, we propose, first, that in drawing up injunction orders, and in lieu of the words at present used, viz., "It is ordered that an injunction be awarded to restrain," &c., the following words be used, viz., "It is ordered that the defendant A. B. be enjoined and restrained, and he the said A. B. is hereby enjoined and restrained from," &c.;—and, secondly, that, to bind the party to obedience, a true copy of such order be served personally upon the party restrained (and also, if necessary, upon such other persons, "servants, agents, or workmen," as the circumstances of the case may require), and that the copy served be endorsed with a notice or memorandum to the following effect:—"Victoria, &c., To the within named A. B. (or, to A. B., if the copy is to be served upon any person not named in the order, for instance upon a "servant, agent, or workman,") greeting. We command you that you yield obedience to the within order of our High Court of Chancery, and that you observe what our said Court shall direct. Witness ourself at Westminster, the — day of — in the — year of our reign"

"Note. If you fail to comply with the above directions, a penalty of £ — may be levied upon your lands, goods, and chattels, to our use. And an order may be made for your immediate committal to prison, without further notice to you."

Or the following form of indorsement (assimilated to the practice in other cases) might be adopted:—"To the within named A. B. If you, the within named A. B., do not comply with the within order, you will be liable to a penalty of £ — to be levied upon your lands, goods, and chattels, as the Court of Chancery may direct, and an order may be made for your immediate committal to prison, without further notice to you." We think that service of the order, thus endorsed, should bind the party in obedience in injunction cases, as effectually as the like course of procedure does in other cases. But distinctly to preserve the principle upon which contempts are founded, we suggest that the endorsement on the copy of the order served should be sealed with the seal of the Record and Writ Clerks Office, the application of which seal to writs has, under Rule 37 of Order 1 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 18, the same authority as the Great Seal.

There is yet another point in connection with the subject to which we must refer. We allude to the "docquet" now required to be left with the officer at the time the writ of injunction is presented to be sealed. Formerly the order itself was also required to be left; but within the last few years it has become the more general practice to return the order to the solicitor. The "docquet" is simply an abbreviated copy of the writ, and is still required, though the reason for its requirement has long since ceased to exist. In former times not only was the decree of the Court required to be enrolled, but the requirement was also extended to some of the writs issued in execution of the decree;—and the writ of injunction seems to have been one of such writs. In "Bohun's Cursus Cancellarie," p. 459, it is stated, "Injunctions ought to be enrolled, or the transcripts thereof filed." See also "Beames' Orders," p. 41. But the practice of enrolling injunctions having long since fallen into disuse, compliance with the requirement to prepare and leave with the officer a docquet of the writ has for many years answered no other purpose than to accumulate waste paper. We think, therefore, that even if the writ is continued, the docquet may be dispensed with, and that in lieu thereof a præcipe should be left with the officer on sealing the writ, as in other cases.

VICE-CHANCELLORS' COURTS.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir JOHN STUART.)

June 24.—Adjournment of the Court upon the death of Lord Chancellor Campbell.—The Vice-Chancellor, on coming into court this morning, was affected with deep emotion, and with difficulty gave utterance to the following words:—"Mr. Bacon, —The stroke of death, with an awful suddenness, has removed the very eminent personage who was at the head of this court. His long and distinguished career and the high position which he occupied require a mark of respect, and therefore I think it not proper that we should proceed to any business this day."

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. WOOD.)

June 22.—The Saturday Half-Holiday.—In the course of the morning, his Honour, in answer to an application on the subject by Mr. Rolt, expressed his willingness not to begin any new cause after 2.30 on a Saturday afternoon.

June 24.—Shortly after the time appointed for the sitting of the Court, his Honour requested the attendance in his private room of some of the leading counsel, and intimated that in consequence of the awfully sudden death of the Lord Chancellor, his Honour would not take his seat upon the bench, but that he would dispose of any matter of a really urgent nature in his private room.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before Mr. Justice HILL.)

June 26.—An application was made by Mr. Kingdon in the course of the day to postpone a cause on account of the absence of a material witness. It was stated that it was an action for a breach of contract at Manchester.

The JUDGE asked why a Manchester cause was brought to London.

Mr. Kingdon said one of the parties lived at Manchester and the other in Cornwall; so he supposed London was considered to be midway.

The learned JUDGE said the plaintiff could not withdraw the record. He had a strong feeling about country causes being brought to London and the time of the Court being thus taken up, and preventing London causes from being tried.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before Mr. Justice KEATING.)

June 22.—Smith v. Haller.—This was an issue directed by Mr. Justice Willes to try the right to certain property seized by the Sheriff of Middlesex under an execution issued in a cause of Haller v. Worman.

On the case being called on,

Mr. Hawkins applied to postpone it, on the ground that a material witness was too ill to attend, and he proposed to change the venue to London.

This not being acceded to by the defendant, who was quite ready to go on,

Mr. Hawkins said he had no alternative but to withdraw the record.

Mr. Serjeant Parry objected that this was an issue directed by the judge, and that the plaintiff had no power over the record.

Mr. Justice KEATING decided that as the record had been entered by the plaintiff in the ordinary way, he had power to withdraw it if he thought fit, and the record was withdrawn accordingly.

Mr. John Bamford, Ashborne, Derby, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

Parliament and Legislation.

Monday, June 24.

THE DEATH OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

In consequence of the death of the Lord Chancellor, the House, on the motion of Earl Granville, at its sitting, adjourned.

Thursday, June 27.

At half-past four o'clock the Lord Chancellor entered the House and took his seat on the woolsack.

The patent of his lordship's creation, under the name and style of Baron Westbury, of Westbury, in the county of Wilts, was read at the table. His lordship thereupon took the oaths and entered his name in the roll of peers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, June 21.

WILLS AND DOMICILE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

Sir G. BOWYER wished to know what course the Government intended to adopt—one Bill on this subject having come down from the House of Lords, and another having been brought in by the Attorney-General.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said that the Attorney-General on an early day would answer the question.

Sir H. CAIRNS hoped that the two Bills would be placed on the paper, so that they might be considered together.

COPYRIGHT OF DESIGNS.

On the motion of Mr. M. GIBSON, the House resolved itself into committee, when leave was given to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the Copyright of Designs. The right hon. gentleman explained that the object of the Bill was simply to give effect to the 12th article of the French treaty.

The Bill was read a first time.

THE NEW COURTS.

Lord J. MANNERS inquired of the Attorney-General whether, in the event of the Courts of Justice Building Act (Money) Bill being read a second time, he would refer the question of site for the proposed buildings to a select committee.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that in all the discussions and inquiries upon this subject there had never been any difference of opinion as to the site for the New Courts, except on the part of some proprietors of houses in Lincoln's-inn fields, who naturally desired that their property should become more valuable. The commission for which we were indebted to the noble lord, and which had conferred great public benefit, were unanimous in the opinion that the site recommended by them should be adopted. Under those circumstances he did not think that he should be right in risking the postponement of the measure by referring this question to a select committee.

Thursday, June 27.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

Upon the motion for the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. LYGON said he thought that the question of site had not been sufficiently considered. The Commissioners had only evidence respecting one scheme, that of the Incorporated Law Society, while there were two other plans suggested. One was to provide for all the Equity Courts in Lincoln's-inn, and the other to concentrate all the law courts in Lincoln's-inn fields, the trustees of which were willing to expend the whole amount received for the site in carrying out metropolitan improvements. He therefore moved that the order for the third reading be discharged, and that the Bill be recommitted.

Mr. COWPER observed that the subject had undergone more consideration than the hon. gentleman supposed. There had been a committee in 1842, and another in 1845. Sir C. Barry was at first in favour of the Lincoln's-inn-fields scheme, but subsequently preferred that now proposed by this Bill. The object was to concentrate all the law courts upon one spot, or in immediate contiguity, and in that respect the Lincoln's-inn-fields plan would be insufficient. The freeholders of Lincoln's-inn-fields proposed to give 3 acres or 3½ acres for that purpose, while the area required was 7 acres. He must press the Bill now, because, having to pass through the House of Lords as a private Bill, postponement would be equivalent to rejection. The House could not be committed to the scheme by assenting to this Bill, because another Bill, the Courts of Justice Money Bill, contained the operative clauses and he would take care that there should be ample time for discussion before that Bill passed.

Mr. Alderman CORKLAND thought that the site in Lincoln's-inn was preferable to the one proposed in the Bill. He was afraid that the scheme favoured by the Government would involve an expenditure of at least £2,000,000.

Mr. SELWYN said the Government were pressing the Bill forward in a manner calculated to stifle all discussion. If the House were hastily to pass the Bill they would prevent the adoption, even the consideration, of a speedy, easy, and inexpensive plan for the accommodation of the Courts of Equity. In 1859 the Society of Lincoln's-inn offered to provide from their own funds, upon their own land, sufficient accommodation for the Courts of Equity, in return for which all they asked was 4 per cent. upon the money actually expended by them, the sum so paid to them not to exceed, under any circumstances, £4,000 a-year. The plans had been prepared and approved by all the equity judges, and they would have been carried out long ago but for this gigantic and visionary scheme of the Government, which would cost at least £2,000,000. He maintained, moreover, that the Suitsors' Fund should be applied to other purposes than those of building courts of common law. The present Lord Chancellor was of the same opinion, and there could be no doubt, in fact, that the scheme of the Government virtually amounted to a confiscation of the Suitsors' Fund. If the Bill were recommitted he should propose the adoption of the plan submitted by the Society of Lincoln's-inn in 1859, and, therefore, he hoped the House would agree to the amendment of the hon. member for Tewkesbury.

Sir W. JOLLIFFE said that if the Government were to give the House an assurance that the question of site would be reconsidered, he should advise his hon. friend to withdraw his amendment.

Lord PALMERSTON believed it was the general opinion of the legal profession that it would be an enormous advantage to it if the plan now proposed were carried out. There were insurmountable objections to building the courts in Lincoln's-inn-fields. If the courts were erected there, they would occupy a vacant space in a part of the town where a vacant space was much needed. He doubted, moreover, whether Lincoln's-inn-fields would be large enough for the purpose. The loss of time and of money arising from the present scattered state of the courts was well known, and he really hoped the House would not object to the passing of this Bill. If the Money Bill, which was the Bill that would determine the matter, should not pass, the whole scheme must fall to the ground; but the present Bill was necessary in order to enable the Government to carry out the arrangements provided by the other measure. The money was to come out of the Suitsors' Fund, and it was only a contingent liability to the public—a liability, moreover, which he hoped would never be practically felt.

Mr. LYGON said that if the Money Bill were referred to a Select Committee, with an instruction to consider the question of site, he should have no objection to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COWPER stated that a Select Committee had already agreed upon a site. He did not know whether the Money Bill was so drawn that the question of site would properly come within the order of reference: but, for his own part, he should have no objection to the reconsideration of that matter.

Mr. LYON said there might be a special reference, and upon that understanding he begged to withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

A BILL FOR SUPPLYING MEANS TOWARDS DEFRAYING THE EXPENSE OF CARRYING INTO EFFECT THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT.

Whereas large sums of money have been and continue to be from time to time paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery in England by the suitors in that court, and others, either for safe custody during the pendency of litigation, or for the purpose of the same being distributed or otherwise; and whereas such sums are invested, or not, in Government Securities, for the benefit of persons interested therein, according as such persons do or do not apply to the Court for such investment to be made; but in consequence of the disinclination or neglect of such persons to have such monies invested, there is always arising from such deposits a large balance of cash in the Bank of England, hereinafter referred to as the General Cash Balance, remaining uninvested and unemployed: and whereas portions of such general cash balance have from time to time, under the authority of Acts of Parliament, been invested in Government Securities in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, on account of the public, and not for the benefit of any particular persons: and whereas the investments so made are realized from time to time as the exigencies of the suitors require, and the produce paid back to the account of the general cash balance: and whereas portions of the income arising from such investments of the general cash balance have been applied to various purposes from time to time directed by Parliament, and the surplus of such income was, from the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight up to the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, invested and accumulated to the credit of an account intitled, "Account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to account of moneys placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," but subsequently thereto such surplus, in pursuance of Acts of Parliament, has been carried over and added to the Suits Fee Fund Account: and whereas there is now standing to the credit of the said account a sum of stock hereinafter referred to as the "Surplus Interest Fund," consisting of the following sums, that is to say, five hundred and seventy thousand, seven hundred pounds, sixteen shillings and one penny, Bank Three pounds per cent. annuities, seven hundred and twenty thousand, nine hundred and four pounds, three shillings and fivepence Reduced Annuities, and twenty-four pounds six shillings, New Three Pounds per centum Annuities, making in the whole, one million, two hundred and ninety-one thousand, six hundred and twenty-nine pounds, five shillings and sixpence, of such annuities: And whereas there is also standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the name of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, to an account intitled "Account of Moneys placed out to provide for the officers of the High Court of Chancery," a sum of two hundred and one thousand and twenty-eight pounds, two shillings and threepence, Bank Three pounds per centum Annuities: And whereas such last-mentioned sum of stock, herein-after referred to as the "Chancery Surplus Fee Fund," has arisen from the accumulation of surplus fees received since the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, from suitors in the Court of Chancery, and carried to the said account in pursuance of an Act of the session of the third and fourth years of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter ninety-four: And whereas there is now standing to the credit of an account in the Paymaster-General's books, called "The Account of the Common Law Surplus Fee Fund," the sum of one hundred and five thousand, seven hundred and seventy-three pounds cash, or thereabouts: And whereas such cash, herein-after referred to as the "Common Law Surplus Fee Fund," has arisen from the surplus of the fees received from suitors in the courts of common law, and paid to the credit of the above-mentioned account, in pursuance of divers Acts of Parliament: And whereas a Bill has been introduced into Parliament in the present session, by the short title of "Courts of Justice Building Act, 1861," and the object of such Bill is to purchase a site capable of affording accommodation to all the superior courts of law and equity, the probate and divorce courts, and the High Court of Admiralty, and the various offices belonging to the same, and to erect suitable buildings for such courts and offices; and it is by the said Bill provided that the expenses to be incurred in carrying into effect the said Courts of Justice Building Act are to be defrayed out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, and it is expedient that the several funds herein-before described as "The Surplus Interest Fund," "The Chancery Surplus Fee Fund," and "The Common Law Surplus Fee Fund," should be appropriated towards replacing the sums so provided: And whereas the capital of "The Surplus Interest Fund," is at present liable to supply any deficiency occurring in the realization of such investments of portions of the general cash balance to answer the demands of the suitors: and the capital of "The Chancery Surplus Fee Fund" is at present liable to supply any deficiency in "The Suits Fee Fund" for payment of the charges thereon: And whereas the income arising from "The Surplus Interest Fund" and "Chancery Surplus Fee Fund" is charged, together with other funds which are not appropriated by this Act, with various annual payments for salaries, pensions, compensation allowances, and other miscellaneous purposes; and in the event of the "Surplus Interest Fund" and "Chancery Surplus Fee Fund" being appropriated to the purposes above mentioned there may be a temporary loss of income to "The Suits Fee Fund" which it may be necessary to make good to a limited extent: And whereas it is expedient that provisions should be made for making good any contingent deficiency or loss of income: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Appropriation of Funds.

1. Whenever, under the direction of Parliament, any money shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund towards defraying the expenses to be incurred in carrying into effect "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1861," there shall be paid, in manner hereinafter-mentioned, firstly out of "The Common Law Surplus Fee Fund," and secondly out of the produce of "The Surplus Interest Fund" and "The Chancery Surplus Fee Fund," so far as such funds will extend, into the receipt of her Majesty's exchequer, to be carried to and form part of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom, such sums as may be equivalent to the amount of monies so provided by Parliament.

2. The Paymaster General shall from time to time, until all monies provided by Parliament for the purposes of "The Courts of Justice Building Act, 1861," have been replaced, pay into the receipt of the exchequer all monies for the time being standing in his books to the account of the Common Law Surplus Fee Fund, at such times and in such manner as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury may direct, and there shall from time to time be sold, under the order of the Lord Chancellor, such portions of the "Surplus Interest Fund" and "Chancery Surplus Fee Fund," or either of them, as will produce the amount of cash specified in any warrants from time to time issued by the said commissioners, and the monies arising from every such sale shall be received by one of the cashiers of the Bank of England, and be paid by him to the account of her Majesty's exchequer at the Bank of England.

3. There shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, or the growing produce thereof, into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, to the account of the "Suits Fee Fund," on the first day of February, on the first day of May, on the first day of August, and on the first day of November in every year, such sum, not exceeding in any one year forty thousand pounds, as may be sufficient to make good to the "Suits Fee Fund" any loss of income caused by the sales of the funds hereby directed to be sold, after deducting or taking credit for the amount of any salaries payable to the abolished masters of the Court of Chancery, and their clerks, and to the master of reports, and of any compensation allowances charged on the Suits Fund in chancery, or the said Suits Fee Fund, and existing at the time of the passing of this Act, which from time to time may cease to be payable, the first of such payments to be made on such one of the said days as may first happen after any sale of the said fund has taken place.

4. If the stock purchased out of the general cash balance of the suitors is at any time insufficient to satisfy the claims of the suitors thereon, such deficiency shall to the extent to which the "Surplus Interest Fund" would have been available, be made good out of the Consolidated Fund.

5. As often as there shall be a deficiency in the "Suitors Fee Fund," at any of the times appointed for the payment thereof of any of the charges thereon, such deficiency shall be supplied out of the Consolidated Fund, to the extent to which the "Chancery Surplus Fee Fund" would have been available, but this provision is not to extend to supplying any deficiency caused by any alteration which may be made in any of the fees payable by the suitors in chancery, unless such alteration shall be approved by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury.

Saving of Jurisdiction on Removal of Courts.

6. Notwithstanding their removal to the site provided by the Concentration of the Courts of Justice Act, 1861, the superior courts of law and equity may exercise the same jurisdiction and enjoy the same rights and privileges as they have hitherto exercised and enjoyed, and all statutes, charters, and other instruments wherein Westminster is described or referred to as being the locality of the said courts shall be construed as if the site provided by the said Act had been described or referred to in the said statutes, charters, and other instruments as the locality of the said courts, instead of Westminster.

7. Her Majesty may by order in council make any alterations that may be thought expedient for the purpose of adapting the forms of testing writs and other instruments, and the forms themselves of writs or other instruments, in use in the said courts, to the change of locality made by the said Concentration of Courts of Justice Act.

8. This Act shall not come into operation until the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1861, has passed into a law.

9. This Act may be cited for all purposes as "The Courts of Justice Building Act (Money), 1861."

EQUITY.

THE MORTMAIN ACT.

Marsh v. The Attorney-General, V.C.W., 9 W. R. 179; Alexander v. Brame, M.R., 9 W. R. 719.

We notice these two cases together because they relate to the same subject, and also because the second, in an earlier stage, furnished an authority which was cited on the argument of the first. In the former case a testator was entitled to a reversionary share in the proceeds of a freehold house, which had been devised, after the failure of a life estate, to trustees upon trust to sell and hold the proceeds in trust for several persons, of whom the testator was one. By his will, he gave the bulk of his property to charity. The question was, whether this reversionary share in the proceeds of the sale of land was within the statute. Vice-Chancellor Wood said that, with regard to any real property of the testator, though directed by his will to be sold, there would be an interest in land which could not be given to charity. But as to property given by a prior testator, on trusts for sale which must be executed, that property could never reach the second testator as land, nor could he make any disposition of his interest in it as land. The second testator had no power of election in himself; but the concurrence of several persons was necessary to stop the sale. On these grounds it was held that this reversionary interest was not within the statute.

In the latter case the principal point was this—A deed of covenant was executed by the covenantor, but not communicated to the covenantees in his lifetime, whereby he covenanted that he would in his lifetime, or that his executors should within twelve months after his decease, but subject and without prejudice to the payment and discharge, out of his assets, of all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and of any bequests he might make by his will, invest £60,000 in Consols in the names of trustees, to be held by them upon certain charitable trusts. The property left by the covenantor at his death consisted to a great extent of personalty savouring of the realty. The case came originally before the Master of the Rolls (2 W. R. 633), from whom there was an appeal to the Lords Justices, assisted by two common law judges (3 W. R. 642), from whom the case went to the House of Lords (7 Jur. N. S. 221), where it was heard with the assistance of six common law judges, who were equally divided in opinion, and judgment was given in last July, reversing the decision of the Lords Justices. The ultimate determination was that the deed of covenant, so far as the chattels real were concerned, was within the meaning of the Mortmain Act, and therefore void. The principle by which the case was to be governed being thus settled, it went back to the Master of the Rolls, and now came before him upon several questions as to the application of this principle. It was established that this covenant was void, so far as it attempted to charge land or any interest in land. But still the question remained whether certain assets of the covenantor came within this description. There were, firstly, arrears of interest on money lent on mortgage which accrued due to, but had not been received by, the covenantor in his life time, and which had, since his death, been paid to his executors. The Master of the Rolls decided that these arrears were within the Act, on the ground that interest on a mortgage is secured in the same way as the principal. There was, secondly, money due to the covenantor at his death secured by bond or promissory note and by memorandum of deposit of title deeds of real estate containing an agreement to execute a legal mortgage. It was decided that the money thus secured was within the Act, as, indeed, seems clear enough. There was, thirdly, money secured by a debenture which assigned the rates and duties leviable by certain dock commissioners. It appeared that there were two classes of vessels from which rates and duties could be taken—viz. vessels using the dock and vessels coming into the river between certain limits. The Master of the Rolls felt no doubt, upon authority, that so far as the money was secured upon rates payable for using the dock, the case came within the Act. As regarded rates payable for using the river, he said that the right of levying tolls upon vessels using it was just the same as that of levying tolls upon passengers along a highway. He, therefore, held that this debenture was within the Act.

As the tendency of the courts has lately been rather to restrict the operation of this Act, it might, perhaps, have been expected that the Master of the Rolls would have decided these two points, or, at least, the former of them, the other way. It will be seen from the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wood in the first case that he is inclined towards restriction. It is a curious example of the limits within which law reform is conceived as possible in England that no one appears to dream of attempting to remove the ambiguities of the Mortmain Act by legislation. Perhaps the reason of this is to be found in a well-grounded conviction that with the existing machinery of law making the result of such an attempt would be disastrous.

DECLARATION OF TRUST OF LAND.

Smith v. Matthews, L. J., 9 W. R. 644.

This is an important case on the Statute of Frauds. By the 7th section of that Act it is enacted that all declarations or creations of trust of land shall be manifested and proved by some writing, signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust. In the case of Forster v. Hale (3 Ves. 696), Lord Alvanley remarked upon this section that it does not require that trusts should be created by writing, but that they should be evidenced by writing; and "it must be proved in toto not only that there was a trust, but what it was." In the present case a trader when in difficulties conveyed land and assigned stock in trade, book debts, and the goodwill of his business to his wife's brother, who undertook to pay his debts, and who afterwards carried on the business for the benefit of the wife and children. A separation deed was subsequently executed between the trader and his wife. The wife's brother died intestate, whereupon the wife, as his heiress-at-law, took the legal estate in fee in the land conveyed to him, and her husband became entitled in her right to the rents, unless the brother had constituted himself a trustee for her, in which case she would be entitled to the benefit of the trust, subject, however, to the question what would be the effect of the legal estate having descended upon her. This question, which is, we believe, a new one, did not call for decision, inasmuch as the Court held that no trust had been effectually manifested. Lord Justice Turner said that the circumstances of the case certainly led to the inference that a trust for the separate use of the wife might have been intended, but he did not find any sufficient manifestation of it. The deed merely conveyed the land in fee. There was a letter of the brother in which he said that he had taken to the business for the benefit of the wife and family. In another letter he pressed a mortgagee of the land to give up a life policy which he held as collateral security, adding, "it is no personal advantage to myself for you to resign it into my hands." These letters, however, did not contain a word of reference to the land. There was, besides, a memorandum, signed by the brother, acknowledging that—he having paid off the mortgage-money charged upon "certain freehold property belonging to" the husband, and also upon the life policy above-mentioned, certain deeds had been delivered to him, "as the trustee of the real and personal estate" of the husband. This memorandum created the serious difficulty of the case. Lord Justice Turner, however, thought that it might mean only this, that the brother considered himself a trustee with reference to the obligation he had undertaken of paying the husband's debts. At all events, the memorandum did not shew what was the trust to which it referred, and, therefore, no trust in favour of the wife could be founded on it. An attempt was made to meet this difficulty by coupling the letters with the memorandum and treating the memorandum as declaring the same trusts of the land as had been declared by the letters of the business. "But," said the Lord Justice, "the memorandum does not refer to the letters; there is no evidence to connect them; and even if they were connected, I very much doubt whether we should, consistently with the statute, be justified in applying the trusts of the business to the land."

COMMON LAW.

BASTARDY PROCEEDINGS—LIMITATION OF TIME.

Re Pickford, Q. B., 9 W. R. 634.

It forms one of the provisions of the Acts regulating the practice upon application summonses (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, amended by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10), that the application for a summons against any one as the father of a bastard child must be made within the space of twelve months from the birth of the child. The only exception made with regard to this limitation in respect of time (the justice and utility of which, as the general rule, is self-evident) is when the alleged father has within that twelve months paid money for its maintenance, in which case the application for a summons may be made at any time subsequently. The present case, however, shows that if the framers of the Acts had been fortunate enough to have foreseen every possible contingency which might happen, another exception to the general rule would have been introduced. For here a summons was duly taken out within the proper time, but could not be served by reason of the party charged having absconded and kept out of the way till the twelve months had elapsed. In the meantime, very unfortunately for applicant, the magistrate by whom the summons had been granted had died; and therefore a fresh summons had to be taken out after application to another justice, on which summons the bastardy proceedings were taken, and in due course an affiliation order obtained. This order, however, on being brought up by certiorari, was quashed by the Court of Queen's Bench; for they considered that the statute imperatively required the application to be made within the twelve months; and that the second summons, though obtained under the peculiar circumstances above mentioned, could not be considered as a continuation only of the first.

A difficulty somewhat similar to the above has sometimes happened with regard to a bill of exceptions in an action—the mode of appealing to the Court of error against the opinion of the presiding judge on some matter of evidence or the like arising at the trial. This proceeding, which is given by statute (13 Ed. 1, s. 1, c. 31), is required by the Act to be sealed by the judge, to whose ruling exception is taken; and in more than one instance mentioned in the books the judge has happened to die before his seal could be procured. In these cases it has been said that all that could be done was to order a new trial, and that the bill of exceptions must drop. (See Bennett v. Peninsular and Oriental Steamboat Company, 1 C. & B., 29).

MASTERS AND WORKMEN.—6 Geo. 3, c. 25; 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3.

Reg. v. Youle, Exch., 9 W. R. 637.

Four years ago a case occurred under the Masters' and Servants' Act, which excited a good deal of attention.* An artisan, named Baker, was convicted before magistrates of having unlawfully absented himself from his master's service, and he was in consequence sent to prison for a month. Upon his discharge, the original term of service being still unexpired, he refused to return to his master, but hired himself to another person in the same trade: and for this offence he was again convicted, and remitted to gaol for a second month. But upon this a motion was made for his discharge, as from an illegal imprisonment, first to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that Court refusing to interfere, afterwards to the Exchequer, which latter application proved successful. In the Court of Queen's Bench the main question which was discussed was whether the first offence and conviction had exhausted the statute, so that a failure to return to the master's service constituted no fresh offence; and the Court being of opinion that a second offence might be thus committed, the writ of habeas corpus, which was applied for, was refused. But in the Exchequer the Court held that irrespective of this question there were circumstances in the case which justified them in discharging the prisoner, and he was discharged accordingly, the only dissentient being the late Mr. Baron Watson. Some members of the Court, however (and among others the Chief Baron), took the opportunity of expressing themselves to be strongly of opinion that under these Acts a workman could only be once punished in respect of a single contract; and in delivering his judgment the Chief Baron made a remark, which is the main reason why the case of the present prisoner (which substantially is the same as that of Baker) is here noticed. He stated that a bill was then in preparation for the amendment of the law upon this subject, which (as he remarks) was, as it still is, in a state far from satisfactory. One of the defects is that it appears to be by no means certain what enactments are really in force. Baker seems to have been charged under 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, but it was suggested that the conviction might also be sustained under an earlier provision contained in 6 Geo. 3, c. 25, which (said Mr. Baron Watson) remained unrepealed. In the present case the conviction was expressly stated in the special case sent up by the magistrates to have been under 6 Geo. 3, c. 25; and upon this question of repeal or no repeal the judgment of the Court ultimately turned. It is impossible not to regret that though so long a time has elapsed since the case of Baker, the obscurity and defects in this branch of the law remain the same, not having been cleared up by any such Act as promised by the Chief Baron. That judge, however, took the opportunity of again repeating his opinion that in these cases there should be in equity (whatever the construction of the Acts may require) but a single punishment in respect of a single engagement to serve, which has been broken and abandoned; and he remarked that whereas if an action were brought for the breach of contract the verdict would put a final end to the contract, so the same consequence should follow if the master chose the alternative of proceeding criminally against the workman. In the present case the prisoner was discharged, because the whole court (Brannwell, B., however, holding such opinion with some qualification) considered that the charge having been made under 6 Geo. 3, c. 75, the prisoner had been convicted under a provision which in fact was no longer in force, but had been superseded by 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

FRANCE.—A very important case, affecting the wills of all British subjects dying in France, was lately decided by the Imperial Court. An unmarried English lady, named Kelly, died in 1845 at Versailles, in which place she had resided for some years; and by her will, dated 1824, she left among other legacies a certain sum to a Catholic college in England, another to a convent in the same country, £1,000 and her jewels to her mother, Mrs. Innis, and £1000 to the Rev. T. Wassal. She also appointed that gentleman and two other persons her executors. For some reason not explained, her property, which was entirely personal, was not claimed, and in 1848 the Domaine de l'Etat, that is the Government, took formal possession of it. In 1854 the Prerogative Court of Canterbury in England decreed that the property of the lady should be taken by Mr. Wassal, who was the sole surviving executor, and should be distributed by him according to the will. In 1856 that gentleman called on the French Domaine to give it up to him, but that department refused. An action was then brought before the Civil Tribunal of Versailles, both by Mrs. Innis and himself; the former claiming the property as the next of kin and heir-at-law of her daughter; the latter as testamentary executor. But it turned out that Miss Kelly was an illegitimate child, and the Tribunal decided that neither by English nor French law can the mother of a natural child inherit from the latter. It therefore rejected her claim. As to Mr. Wassal, it postponed a decision with respect to his demand, until he should produce proof—1st. That at the time of the death of the testatrix the persons to whom she had bequeathed legacies were living; 2. That under the English law educational establishments and religious communities can receive legacies. Against this decision an appeal was presented to the Imperial Court, and the matter was argued yesterday. The Court gave a judgment of some length to this effect:—Although Miss Kelly was proved to have resided in France 25 years, she had never been naturalised nor even domiciled, and consequently as regards her property, she was under the English law, which holds that a natural mother has no right to inherit from her child, even though she may have formally acknowledged the latter; that it was not denied that Miss Kelly was illegitimate, and that consequently Mrs. Innis's claim could not be admitted. With respect to Mr. Wassal, the Court, said that, according to Arts. 713 and 768 of the Code Napoleon, all property to which a legal claim cannot be established goes to the State; that the demand of Mr. Wassal for the property of Miss Kelly was made in the capacity of executor, that is to say, for persons and communities which he legally represents; and that it follows that he is bound to prove that at the death of the testatrix those persons were living and those communities capable of inheriting. The Court consequently decided that the Tribunal of Versailles had correctly laid down the law, and it confirmed the former judgment. Subsidiary questions were raised as to the period for which the Government should pay interest on the property, in the event of its being made to restore it; and as to whether Mr. Wassal, as a foreigner, should not be required to increase the sum he had deposited as caution money for payment of costs. On the first point the decision was that though the Government had taken possession of the property in 1848, yet as no claim had been made for it until 1856, interest should run only from the latter date. On the second point the Court ruled that as the Government was bound to pay to Mr. Wassal without delay the legacies left to persons or communities whose existence and right he should prove, he not only need not give any more caution money, but should have that which he had already deposited restored to him, subject to the condition of deducting from it the costs he had incurred.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of the Law Amendment Society was held on Tuesday, the 18th inst., at 3, Waterloo Place, Pall Mall.—Lord Brougham presided.—The report, which was read by the Secretary, stated that there had been a considerable accession of members during the session, and that the prospects of the Society were highly encouraging. It appeared that several valuable papers on subjects connected with law reform had been read at the general meetings, and that special committees were then preparing important reports. A careful statement was given of the views of the Society, as expressed in the various discussions which had taken place during the session, upon the Bankruptcy Bill, Patent Law, Opening of Biddings in Chancery, Procedure in Criminal Trials, Private Bill Legislation, Charitable Trusts, &c. Regret was expressed that the general expectation for a satisfactory settlement of the law of bankruptcy was likely to be again disappointed.

Mr. EDWARD WEBSTER, pursuant to notice, asked the President "whether it was within the objects of the Law Amendment Society to take under its consideration the effects of the statutes 13 Elizabeth, c. 12, and 13 & 14 Charles II., c. 4. Special reference was made to the proceedings about to be taken under the Act of Uniformity against one of the clerical authors of the "Essays and Reviews."

His Lordship replied that the consideration of the Act of Uniformity was certainly within the scope of this Society, but as a matter of prudence he deprecated the discussion of a subject which might bring the Society into collision with the theological controversy then going on. Lord Brougham then stated he was sorry he was obliged to leave the meeting to attend the House of Lords, but he could not do so without expressing his anxiety for the prosperity of the Society. He had often said that success depended on their continued labours. The present government was undoubtedly favourable to legal reform, and the Society should make good use of its opportunity. The French proverb said, "When it rains, take your cloak with you; when it is fine, do as you please." If the Government were adverse to the objects of the society, he would say, "Do as you please," but having a Government, which he believed was anxious for the amendment of the law, he earnestly advised them to prepare for all difficulties, and strenuously carry out the great objects for which the society had been instituted.

The noble lord then left, and the chair was taken by the Right Hon. JOSEPH NAPIER.

Mr. SLANEY, M.P., in moving the adoption of the report, expressed his regret that owing to the pressure of private business and financial measures, so little was done by Parliament within the proper sphere of legislation.

Mr. SYMONDS seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously. He was sorry that no reference had been made in the reports to the minister of justice.

Mr. NAPIER agreed that it was important that there should be a department of justice. The late Sir R. Peel proposed to have a secretary for the affairs of justice, to relieve the home department of all the work connected with the administration of justice in England and Ireland. That would give uniformity to our law, and without it legislation would always be dilatory and uncertain.

Lord Brougham was unanimously re-elected president. The vice-presidents were also re-elected. The new managers elected for the ensuing year were—G. J. Shaw Lefevre, Esq., Seymour Teulon, Esq., Thomas Webster, Esq. F.R.S., Alexander Billing, Esq.

ORDER IN CHANCERY.

Whereas it is proper that the accounts kept by the Accountant-General of this Court should be examined and compared in order to settle the same; and whereas it will require considerable time to perfect such examination, and it is necessary that a time should be appointed for closing the books of accounts of the said Accountant-General for the purposes aforesaid, I do order that the books of the said Accountant-General be closed from and after Monday the 19th day of August next, to Monday the 28th day of October next, inclusive, excepting upon the days and for the purposes hereinafter-mentioned, in order to adjust the accounts of the suitors with the books kept at the bank; and that during that time, no draft for any money, except as hereinafter provided, or certificate for any effects under the care and direction of this Court, be signed or delivered out by the Accountant-General, or any stocks or annuities accepted or transferred by him relating to the suitors of this Court. And that no purchase, sale, or transfer be made by the said Accountant-General unless the order and request, or registrar's certificate, be left at his office, on or before Thursday the 8th day of August next, and that no order for payment of any money out of court, which may be then in Court, be received in the Accountant-General's office after Saturday the 10th day of August next. Provided nevertheless that the office of the said Accountant-General shall be open on Monday the 14th Tuesday the 15th, and Wednesday the 16th days of October next, for the delivery out of any regular interest drafts which have become payable in respect of the October dividends, and of any other regular interest drafts which shall have become payable during the closing of the office as aforesaid. And to the end that the suitors may have notice hereof, and apply to the Court as there shall be occasion, to have money paid to them out of the bank, or stocks or annuities transferred to them before the 19th day of August next, I do order that this order be entered and set up in the several offices of this Court.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.—The following resolutions regarding the mutilation of the Bankruptcy Bill by the House of Lords have been adopted by the Associated Chambers of Commerce:—Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill. "At a special meeting of the Standing Committee of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, consisting of the following Chambers, viz:—Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Bristol, Coventry, Dundee, Dowsbury, Glasgow, Gloucester, Hull, Kendal, Leeds, Liverpool, Norwich, Sheffield, Southampton, Staffordshire Potteries, Wolverhampton, charged by special resolution of a general meeting of the Association to consider the subject of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws, with directions to take action thereon. After very careful consideration of the various alterations made by the House of Lords in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, introduced by her Majesty's Government, it was resolved unanimously, That this Committee strongly disapproves the rejection of clauses 123, 124, 125, 128, 130, 133, 134, 135, 136, 145, relating to the appointment and powers of creditors' assignees. Also of the rejection of clauses 181, 182, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, relating to the mode of rendering accounts, and to the payment of dividends. Also of the rejection of clause 119, giving power to creditors to accept proposals made by bankrupts. Also of the rejection of clauses 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, empowering the Court of Chancery to delegate certain matters to the commissioners, &c., of local courts. That this Committee also disapproves the following alterations and additions made to the Bill by the House of Lords:—The alteration in clause 118 depriving the creditors of the option of removing the case from the Court; the alteration in clause 148 with reference to accounts; the alterations in clauses 193 and 195 rendering the assent of three-fourths in number as well as value necessary to give validity to deeds of arrangement; and the alterations in clause 200 to the same effect, together with that requiring all the property of the debtor to be comprised in the trust deed. Also to the last paragraph of clause 100; to clause B, at page 25, substituted for clause 103, favouring non-traders; and to paragraphs F, G, and K, pages 33 and 34, so far as relates to the word 'non-trader.' That this committee approves the paragraph printed in red ink at the close of clause 208, provided, '30 days' be substituted therein for '14 days.' That the alterations above mentioned would deprive the Bill of its principal value in the estimation of the mercantile community; and this committee earnestly trusts that the House of Commons and her Majesty's Government will offer to those alterations their determined opposition. That a memorial based on the above resolutions, and signed by the chairman, be presented to her Majesty's Government. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each Associated Chamber, with a strong recommendation that they immediately petition Parliament in accordance therewith; to the National Association for the promotion of Social Science, to the Mercantile Law Amendment Society, and to each member of the House of Commons.—CHARLES M. NORWOOD, President."

BANKRUPTCIES THIS YEAR.—It appears that the bankruptcy rate this year is rather seriously above the average of the preceding decade. The number of bankruptcies gazetted during the three months ending the 31st of March was, in the Liverpool district, 31; in the Manchester, 28; in the Birmingham, 70; in the Leeds, 35; in the Bristol, 25; in the Exeter, 10; and in the Newcastle, 6—making a total of 205, besides 154 failures gazetted in the metropolitan jurisdiction, or 359 in all. This would give a yearly total of 1,436, while in the 10 years ending the 31st of December the total gazetted was only 1,123. The present bankruptcy rate is, therefore, nearly 28 per cent above the average. This increase has arisen mainly in the jurisdictions not comprised within the metropolitan district, as the advance in the latter is only at the rate of 12 per cent. Of the purely provincial districts Exeter and Newcastle are the only localities in which the current bankruptcy rate shows a reduction; but in the Newcastle jurisdiction an excellent state of things seems to prevail, the rate being 50 per cent. below the usual total. In the Liverpool district it is 56 per cent. in excess; in the Manchester district 26 per cent. in excess; in the Birmingham district 79 per cent. in excess; in the Leeds district 33 per cent. in excess; and in the Bristol district 47 per cent. in excess.

PROBATE DUTY.—The sum of £1,188,649 was paid for probate and administration duty in England in the year 1860—an increase upon the previous year, and upon all previous years. Of this sum £708,333 was paid in London, and the remainder, £480,316, at the district registries created under the Probate Act of 1857. At Wakefield there was £46,792 received, at Manchester, £35,240, at Liverpool, £25,939, at Bristol, £24,446, at Exeter, £23,057, at Chester, £22,459, at Birmingham, £20,738.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.—Some papers which have been laid before Parliament relating to the arrest of Count Teleki give the laws of the German States with regard to mutual extradition. By a resolution passed Aug. 18, 1836, the confederated States of Germany mutually engaged to deliver up any one convicted of any attempt hostile to the Sovereign, or to the existence, integrity, constitution, or safety of another confederated State, or of a conspiracy with a view to such attempt, or of favouring such; provided that the individual is not a subject of the State applied to for extradition. By a later resolution, passed January 26, 1854, the engagement is extended to persons condemned or accused by a tribunal of the offended State (or against whom a sentence of arrest has been there pronounced) of "any crimes or transgressions" not being frauds in taxation, or transgressions against police or financial regulations, it being understood that the offence be likewise recognised as a crime or transgression by the laws of the State on which the demand is made, but not in this case punishable in the judiciary court of that State. With the individual all articles are to be given up which may be in his possession, as well as any others which may aid in proving the crime. Later in the same year 1854 the Governments of Austria and Saxony entered into an agreement to extend the foregoing engagements to the non-German dominions of Austria.

CURRENT TOPICS.

We refrained last week from giving currency to the numerous rumours which were then afloat relative to the changes amongst the law officers of the Crown likely to be made in consequence of the promotion of Sir Richard Bethell to the Chancery. It was generally reported that Mr. Roundell Palmer was to be made Attorney-General over the head of Sir William Atherton, who was supposed to be not strong enough for the place, and therefore, it was said, must remain Solicitor-General until some vacancy, occurred on the Common Law Bench. It appears, however, that there was no precedent for this strong measure exactly in point; and, contrary to expectation, Sir William Atherton has been appointed Attorney-General, and Mr. Palmer has accepted the lower dignity. There can be no doubt that his appointment will give general satisfaction. For some time he has probably made a larger income—apart from official sources—than any member of the bar on either side of Westminster Hall. He has been not only the unquestionable leader of a most important and lucrative branch of the Court of Chancery, but has had the largest amount of business, both in the Chancery Appellate Court, and also in the House of Lords, and the Privy Council. Being, moreover, a good speaker and a tried member of Parliament, of high reputation, he is calculated to be a very serviceable law officer of the Crown, and his appointment is entirely creditable to the Government, who seem to have been anxious only to secure the best man for the vacant office.

We mentioned last week that a number of memorials had been presented to Sir Cresswell Cresswell by various law societies in London and throughout the country, for the purpose of obtaining the abrogation of the new Order of the Court of Probate for converting the district registries into so many speculative government law agencies. We give two of these memorials at length; they may be taken as containing a fair account of the question at issue. Similar memorials have come from the law societies of Liverpool, Birmingham, Hull, Leicester, and also of Kent, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire, as well as one from Bristol, signed by eighty-five solicitors practising in that city. The following is the memorial of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association:—

That the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association is composed of nearly 800 practising attorneys and solicitors in England and Wales, of whom nearly 600 are provincial practitioners.

That in consequence of the grievances of which the provincial members of your memorialists' body had, for some time previous to the issuing of the orders of the 16th of April, 1861, hereinafter mentioned, complained, respecting the practice pursued to their prejudice by the district registrars of the Court of Probate, and the fees taken by such registrars, your memorialists' committee of management entered into extensive correspondence and communication on the subject with solicitors in towns having district probate registries, the result of which showed that some district registrars acted as solicitors in their own courts, others not, but that nearly all charged in some shape or other for the extra trouble entailed upon them in cases of application for probate or letters of administration by parties in person, without the intervention of a proctor, solicitor, or attorney, all to the prejudice of the country solicitors.

That, injurious to them as the system was, the practice which has now succeeded it appears to be still more prejudicial, as, by the said Orders of the Court of Probate dated the 16th day of April, 1861, it is expressly directed that, on and after the 1st day of May last, it shall be part of the duty of the district registrars to prepare affidavits and all other necessary documents for parties applying to them in person, for which a scale of fees in addition to the ordinary office fees is to be charged, but which additional fees are to be considerably less than those authorised to be taken for their own use by proctors, solicitors, or attorneys, when such applications are made through them instead of by the parties in person.

That by the combined operation of these orders, and of the minute of the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, appointing salaries instead of fees as the remuneration of the district registrars, Government offices are established at the expense of the general public to compete (and at lower charges) with the provincial solicitors in the acquisition of business, which, besides being a harsh and unfair course towards them, appears really an impolitic one as regards the public.

That the impolicy, in a public point of view, consists partly in the unduly uniting in the persons of the district registrars the two incompatible and conflicting duties of suitor and judge; for the registrar, having to act in a quasi-judicial character, as the officer who is to decide on the sufficiency or insufficiency of evidence, should not also be charged with the preparation of the documents constituting such evidence. Such a system must be productive of mischief, and is opposed to the first principles of political economy and English jurisprudence.

That such a practice is fraught with further danger to the public from the persons applying in person for probate or administration being necessarily, in most cases, totally unknown to the registrars, while solicitors seldom if ever act for clients who are personally unknown to them, except on the introduction of some third person, of whose position and integrity they have knowledge, by which means a great protection against forgery and other malpractices is obtained, and a considerable guarantee of good faith afforded.

That district registrars are in such cases permitted to administer oaths on affidavits prepared by themselves, though by No. 65 of the rules, orders, and instructions for district registrars, no affidavit is to be deemed sufficient which has been sworn before the party in whose behalf the same is offered, or before his proctor, solicitor or attorney, or before a clerk of his proctor, solicitor, or attorney. Besides being open to the objection against which this rule was framed to guard, the practice affords another unfair facility to the Government offices in their competition with the provincial solicitors, who can scarcely fail gradually to lose the whole of their common form probate business, if the newly instituted régime is continued.

That thus to deprive the provincial solicitors of a portion of their business is a breach to their prejudice of the understanding upon which the proctors were enabled by Parliament to be admitted to practice in all branches of the business of attorneys and solicitors.

Your memorialists humbly pray that your lordship will be pleased to take the matters of this memorial into consideration. Signed on behalf of the Association.—J. S. TOWN, Chairman.

PHILIP RICKMAN, Secretary.

The Memorial of the Manchester Law Association is as follows:—

The attention of your memorialists has been directed to the orders of the Court of Probate, dated the 16th April, 1861, and to the table of fees directed to be taken in the District Registries of the Court of Probate when applications are made by parties in person, and not through a proctor, solicitor, or attorney.

Your memorialists consider the practice which these orders are manifestly intended to promote—of applying to the district registrars direct, for grants of probate or administration in their own registries—to be contrary to the spirit of the Legislature, prejudicial to the public interests, and invidious and unfair to the provincial solicitor.

1st, Your memorialists submit that the practice is contrary to the spirit of the Legislature, inasmuch as the proper duties of the registrar, with reference to applications for the grant of probate or letters of administration, partake of a judicial character; whereas, when such applications are made to him without the intervention of a solicitor, the registrar is placed in the position of first having to prepare the requisite affidavits and other papers, and then of being the sole judge of the documents so prepared by himself; and in cases requiring special affidavits, or upon questions respecting sureties to administration bonds, the registrar will first have to get up the necessary evidence, and then be the sole judge of the sufficiency thereof, a course which your memorialists would observe, is directly at variance with that pursued in the principal registry, and is not adopted in connection with any of the courts of law or equity. The district registrars also swear affidavits prepared by themselves, which the solicitors are precluded from doing.

2ndly, Your memorialists submit that the practice is prejudicial to the public, because it takes away one great protection which the intervention of a solicitor provides against fraud. The parties presenting a will to a district registrar, or applying to him to take out an administration, are almost invariably strangers to him, and he has no means of judging of or enquiring into their good faith; whereas a solicitor concerned for them would be acquainted with them, or would learn particulars respecting them before making the application.

As an instance of the necessity of such protection, your memorialists refer to the case of one Ann Dean, deceased, in the district registry at Manchester, in which, upon an application in person probate was granted of a forged will.

The practice is further injurious by fostering a class of agents who act as quasi lawyers, and take applicants in person to the registry, where the fees for preparation of the papers by the district registrar are charged, and the parties have in addition to compensate the agent for his trouble, and thus in fact pay an amount nearly, if not quite, equal to the usual scale of professional remuneration, without having the advantage of professional responsibility.

Your memorialists therefore pray that the recent orders may be rescinded, and that the practice of the district registries may be assimilated to that of the principal registry, and no applications for probate or administration be allowed to be made in person or through the district registrars of the court to which application is made; but that all such applications be made through the solicitor or proctor of the party applying.

In the London Gazette of the 26th ult. there appeared an order in council which brings the West Indian Incumbered Estates Acts into operation in Jamaica. The local act arrived in England about three months ago, and great credit is, no doubt, due to the Legislature of that colony for having adopted a measure similar to that which experience has proved to have been most beneficial in Ireland. Some delay has taken place since the arrival of the Jamaica Act in this country, owing, we believe, to a slight informality in one of its clauses, but so far as that important colony is concerned the measure is now in full operation. This is a matter of interest alike to the legal and the commercial world. The source of our cotton supplies is the question of the day, and it is one that must increase instead of diminishing in importance. Not one-tenth part of Jamaica is cultivated, and it is well-known that both the soil and the climate of that fine island are admirably adapted for the cultivation of the cotton plant. If we can judge from the example of Ireland, we may expect, as a result of the newly-passed Incumbered Estates Acts, soon to witness an influx of fresh energy and capital into the most extensive and valuable of our West India colonies. The islands of St. Vincent and Tobago, with some others, have already adopted these Acts, and the remainder, with the exception of Trinidad and one or two others where Dutch law prevails, will now, doubtless, follow the good example set them. As many of our readers are interested, either directly or indirectly, in West India property, some information as to the practical operation of these Acts may not be unacceptable. The original West India Incumbered Estates Act was passed so far back as the year 1854, the Duke of Newcastle being then, as he is now, Secretary for the Colonies. The measure was borrowed from the Act which had worked so beneficially in Ireland. Like most law amendments, however, the West India Act required itself to be amended. It remained absolutely a dead letter until the year 1857, when the island of St. Vincent first adopted it. Commissioners and a secretary were then appointed. The late Mr. Phipps, Q.C., was the first Chief Commissioner, and Sir Frederick Rogers, now her Majesty's Under Secretary for the Colonies, was Assistant-Commissioner; Mr. R. J. Cust, who has published an excellent handbook of the practice of the Court,* has from the first been Secretary. In 1858, Mr. Phipps died, and Mr. H. J. Stonor, a well known conveyancer, was appointed Chief Commissioner. Shortly afterwards the Amendment Act of 1858 was passed, which has substantially assimilated the West Indian to the Irish Acts. Since then cases of great nicety and difficulty have arisen in the Court and have been carried to the Privy Council, where Mr. Stonor's judgments have been characterized by Lord Kingsdown as "distinguished by remarkable learning and ability."† The West Indian and British interests involved may, therefore, rely with confidence on the able and efficient administration of these important Acts. We believe that Sir F. Rogers still holds the appointment of Assistant-Commissioner, but that he does not assist Mr. Stonor in his judicial duties. Should the business of the court increase as we anticipate, we may expect that an acting Assistant-Commissioner will be required, as well as additional officers. The Court, which is now held at 8, Park-street, Westminster, will, we hope, like every other court, before long be removed to Lincoln's-inn. For the present we shall only add that a great opportunity is now afforded, as well to our colonists abroad as to our capitalists at home, of redeeming from waste and neglect our valuable West Indian possessions, and to the legal profession, in both its branches, of co-operating in this good work.

The Legislature of Upper Canada in its last session passed an Act to repeal the laws relative to the registration of judgments in that province. It also enacts amongst other things that "no judgment rule, order, or decree for the payment of money of any court of Upper Canada shall create or operate as a lien or charge upon lands, or any interest therein." And further, that in addition to the statutes repealed by name, "all other statutes and parts and clauses of statutes authorising the registration of judgments, decrees and orders for the payment of money in Upper Canada" are thereby repealed. The Act is to come into operation on the 1st of September next. It has been passed as the best solution of the difficulties and complications connected with the English law of judgments, and the statutory provisions relating to their registration, which to some extent were applicable in the province, and which are found in the old country to be so burdensome as to make many persons desire for England some such sweeping enactment as has been passed by the province of Upper Canada.

We learn from the Upper Canada Law Journal that the Law Society of that province has instituted four scholarships for its law students. Each scholarship is to be held for one year only, but any scholar is to be eligible to compete for a senior scholarship in the succeeding year. In Upper Canada persons who are not graduates are obliged to qualify by five years' service under articles, for admission as attorneys, except in the case of university graduates, who must serve at least three years. The scholarships are to be open only to students whose names are standing on the books of the Society, and are as follows:—

* Cust's "West India Incumbered Estates Acts." London: Amer. 1859.

† Ex parte Fraser, 8 Weekly Reporter, p. 376, 29th March, 1860.

£30 scholarship to students under one year.

£40 scholarship to students over one year and under two years.

£50 scholarship to students over two years and under three years.

£60 scholarship to students over three years and under four years.

The subjects for these several examinations have been published, and are so limited as to make us infer that the attainments of the competitors are less than might reasonably have been expected. Compared with the examination which all articulated clerks are expected to pass at our Law Institution, the books prescribed for the candidates of the last year are not only very few, but rather more elementary than we should expect, where the prize is really worth having. It has long, however, been a moot point, whether an exhaustive and searching examination in a small number of elementary books, is not a better test of sound and useful intellectual acquisitions than a superficial and necessarily cursory, and somewhat random examination, in a greater variety of books, of a more advanced and formidable character.

A case relating to Irish marriage law and the English law of settlement was decided this week at Warwick before the justices at quarter sessions. It arose upon an appeal, in which the inhabitants of the parish of Leek Woolton were appellants and the inhabitants of the parish of Kenilworth were respondents, in respect to the settlement of one Mary Young. The main question for adjudication was the same as formed one branch of the matrimonial dilemma in which the defendant in the recent case of Thelwall v. Yelverton in the Irish Court of Common Pleas was involved. The invalidity of a marriage between a Protestant and Roman Catholic, celebrated in Ireland by a Roman Catholic priest, which was so amply discussed in the cause célèbre mentioned, formed in the present case the basis of an adjudication on the English law of settlement. The appeal was brought to quash an order of justices respecting the settlement of Mary Young, who was the widow of a soldier. He had acquired a settlement in the parish of Leek Woolton; but it was contended on behalf of the appellants, that this right did not devolve on the present pauper, his reputed wife, inasmuch as her marriage was illegal and void under the Irish Act 19th Geo. 2, c. 13, s. 1. This enactment invalidates all marriages, celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, where both or either of the parties are Protestants. The soldier was a Protestant, and, in 1846, when quartered in Cashel, was married in the priest's house to the present pauper. The respondent's counsel endeavoured to show that the deceased soldier had made no profession of the Protestant faith within twelve months previous to his death, so as to come within the provisions of the Irish Act, as also that sufficient evidence was not given to prove that the celebrant was a Roman Catholic. As English courts do not take judicial cognizance of Irish statutes passed before the Union, which must, therefore, be proved to those courts as facts, an Irish barrister deposed as to the effect of the Irish law in invalidating mixed marriages; and that the Act of Geo. 2 was still, as regards the parties to such marriages, unrepealed. The statute 22 & 23 Vic., c. 63, referred to ante, p. 522, has empowered courts of justice, in an action depending in any part of her Majesty's dominions, to remit a case for the opinion of one of the superior courts in any other part of the British empire. The word "action" is declared by the interpretation clause to "include every judicial proceeding instituted in any court, civil, criminal, or ecclesiastical." There is little room, therefore, to doubt that on such cases as the present, English courts of quarter sessions may obtain the opinion of one of the Irish superior courts. The justices at the quarter sessions considered that the evidence clearly disclosed that the deceased soldier had been a Protestant, that the marriage was celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, and that, consequently, there was no room for the application of the maxim, "Omnia presumuntur rite esse acta," and for assuming that the celebrant was a Protestant minister.

We consider that Mr. Villiers' Bill to amend the law of settlement now before Parliament will, if it become law, greatly abridge litigation, by shortening the period necessary to acquire a settlement from five years, as fixed by Sir Robert Peel's Act, to three years. The Bill may contradict Malthusian doctrines, but it tends to remove much misery from "the short and simple annals of the poor." We shall not repine at the extinguishment of the glories of Bott and Caldecott, nor at the obsolescence of the rhyme regarding the settlement of a feme sole, who married a man who had none.

"Quoth Sir John Pratt, her settlement
Suspended doth remain,
Living the husband—but him dead,
It doth revive again."

We may add that the late Lord Chancellor's Bill to repeal the Irish Act, 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, s. 1, has not yet become law.

The annual dinner of the Law Amendment Society is to take place on next Saturday, the 13th instant, at the Ship Tavern, Greenwich. Lord Brougham has promised to preside on the occasion.

WILL FRAUDS—DISTRICT REGISTRIES.

The memorial of the Manchester Law Society to Sir Cresswell Cresswell, which will be found in another part of these columns, refers to a case which recently occurred in the Manchester district, for the purpose of showing how important to the public interest it is to have the intervention of a solicitor in every application for probate of a will. In the case alluded to, probate of a forged will had been obtained in the Manchester District Registry, upon the application of the person propounding the will, without the intervention of any professional agent. The recent General Order not only enables any party to apply in person for probate or administration, but compels the district registrar to act as the solicitor and agent of the person so applying. No guarantee of any kind as to his character or bonâ fides is necessary, nor has a district registrar a right to require a party applying in person to obtain any introduction, or produce any evidence of respectability. It requires little acquaintance with the business of the Probate Court to understand that such an arrangement will necessarily open a wide door to the grossest fraud and imposition. It is, in truth, an invitation to a class of schemers and plotters, who will not be slow to avail themselves of it; and if the obnoxious General Order remains in force, we shall soon see many cases like the one referred to in the Manchester memorial. Indeed, there have been before the Judge Ordinary himself, numerous cases in which he must have seen, as the public has, the necessity of securing for the Court and the public, the responsible agency, in every will case, of a solicitor. To go no further back than the morning journals of yesterday, we find in them a useful illustration of this point; and as some of our readers may not have read the report, we shall shortly state the facts which were disclosed upon the evidence of the plaintiff, who was the only witness examined.

The plaintiff was a Doctor Davis Griffiths Jones, who stated that he lived in Woburn-place, and that he was an M.D. of Marischal College, Aberdeen. According to his own account, some years ago he made the acquaintance of the alleged testatrix, and she then resided with him for a few days at a house near Windsor, which he occupied at the time. At the expiration of his visit a misunderstanding arose as to the terms upon which Mrs. Bellis, the alleged testatrix, resided with the doctor, he insisting that she had come as a patient, and she, that she was merely a guest. After this quarrel, no further communication seems to have taken place between her and her would-be medical adviser, until the 11th of last February, two days before the date of the alleged will, and three before the day of her death. The Doctor, however, asked a jury to believe that, at the earnest solicitation of Mrs. Bellis, he had rescued her from a boarding-house in Fitzroy-square, and given her the tranquil and pleasant asylum of his own professional mansion, the comfortable ministrations of the wife of his bosom, and the anxious services of himself, because he was a "Christian and a friend, and took compassion on her." At all events, according to his own account, whatever his motive was, the poor lady felt herself bound, a few hours before her death, to make her will in favour of her generous benefactor, and this was the instrument which he propounded, but which, as the deceased was illegitimate, and a childless widow at the time of her death, was disputed by the Queen's Proctor as representative of the Crown. The cross-examination of the plaintiff affords materials for a curious little historiette, which, with the aid of a few suitable etchings from the pencil of Leech, might be made a useful, and certainly an amusing guide for schemers intending to apply in person for probate in district registries. Doctor Jones had practised homœopathy and also hydropathy for nine or ten years, and was the owner of a medicine with the unpronounceable name of "Axtamankaz," a farinaceous substance, or substitute for cod-liver oil, but made of "cereals, rice, and other compounds." So far, however, and even still further, namely, as to all that related to the purchase of this inestimable compound from some mythical Dutchman, and the "establishment" for its sale in New Oxford-street, there was hardly enough in the evidence in chief or cross-examination of the plaintiff to justify a jury in giving a verdict against him; but yet before the Queen's Advocate had done with him, it became so plain that his oath was no guarantee for the truth of anything that he said, that even his own counsel stated that he would not "insult the jury" by asking them to believe such a man. We have said that he claimed to be a doctor of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and so in fact he was. But after a particular account of how he went to Aberdeen, and where he slept there, and of his visit to the college about his degree, and a deliberate averment of the fact of his examination, he, finally, upon being pressed, admitted that he had never been to Aberdeen at all, but that another person had represented him at the so-called examination. Upon this the jury of course at once intimated that it would be useless to proceed with this examination, as they believed the witness was "quite unworthy of credit." The verdict was thereupon entered for the defendant, and Doctor Jones was condemned in costs, as all honest men will be glad to learn; and we only hope that the procedure in the Probate Court in litigated cases is not so very inexpensive as to prove no terror, but rather an inducement, to such testamentary practitioners as this homœopathist. Our present purpose in adverting to this case, however, is to adduce it as an illustration of the great public danger which must arise from the fact that all such schemers as this Doctor Jones, throughout the provinces, can insist upon being the clients, and upon employing the active services, of the very persons whom the public has appointed to protect its interests in the district registries. There is very little doubt that if Doctor Jones was able to have selected Manchester or Birmingham as the scene of his doings, the British public would never have been enlightened as it now is about the manner in which he acquired his Scotch degree, and that he would have been rewarded according to his own estimate of the kind and Christian services which he so unselfishly rendered to this deceased lady. At all events he would have the satisfaction of knowing that instead of being obliged to prove his case before an uninterested judge, and an independent tribunal, the only official whom he would have to satisfy as to the character of his evidence would be the registrar, who was engaged as his private solicitor in preparing it, and whose salary partly consisted of a payment which compelled the registrar so to act. We commend this case to the notice of our country readers, although we have no doubt there are few of them who could not from their own experience add to our stock of information on this interesting question.

THE SATURDAY HALF-HOLIDAY.

A recent announcement in the Times that the Chancery judges had at length made some concession to the general feeling in favour of the Saturday half-holiday was read with very general approval by the profession and the British public. It was announced that in one of the courts the eminent judge presiding there had stated that he "would not commence any fresh cause after 2.30 on a Saturday afternoon." The concession was not much, to be sure. To make it of any practical avail there must have been on each successive Saturday something like a conspiracy between the leaders of the court. Rising at a particular time and not beginning any fresh matter after that period are, as those who are doomed to sit in court day by day know, widely different things. Unless, therefore, the Bar and the solicitors combined together and, so to speak, "struck work" at 2.30, refusing any judicial invitations to bring on a short matter, or commence a reply, &c., at 2.25 or thereabouts, the half-hour would seldom have been enjoyed by the profession. However, we were thankful for the instalment, small as it was, and in the hope that another half-hour if not hour might be conceded during this hot summer weather, we would not quarrel with the scant measure of the concession. Lord Westbury, on the day of taking his seat as Lord Chancellor, is reported to have stated that to suit what he considered to be the wish of the profession the court would not sit after 2.30 on Saturdays. This looked like an official confirmation of what had been intimated in another branch of the court on the preceding Saturday. The Lord Chancellor announced his act of grace without any qualification or reservation. There it was on record by the supreme head of the law that after 2.30 the court (and here, by the way, we claim the benefit of the usual interpretation clause, that "every word importing the singular number only" shall be extended to mean the plural also) would not sit; and it was only natural to expect that the qualification as to not commencing any fresh cause would be removed, and that the half-hour, sans phrase, would be conceded in every branch of the court. But mark the result! On Monday last, we learn from the Times reporter that in announcing even that qualified concession in the particular court to which he is attached, he was "led into a misapprehension," and that the observations were not intended for Saturdays in general, but must be confined to Saturday, the 22nd June, in particular. That court accordingly did not rise on Saturday, June 29, till after three o'clock, without even the short interval for lunch usually conceded to suffering legal stomachs. Whether the Lord Chancellor will allow his announcement to remain a dead letter in all the courts except his own remains to be seen. We sincerely trust that he will not leave thus incomplete the concession with which he has inaugurated his accession to the high office so deservedly earned by him. If the great business houses in the city, the banks, the leading solicitors, the shopkeepers in our principal thoroughfares, have nearly all given their adhesion to the Saturday half-holiday movement, and with few exceptions closed their counting-houses and offices at two, dismissing their clerks, &c., to an afternoon of honest, healthy recreation, why should the Court of Chancery stubbornly refuse the same boon to its over-worked, and in many cases underpaid attendants? Is there such a pressure of business that the public would suffer by being mulcted of an hour of judicial time during the week? The cause-lists in most branches of the court distinctly show the contrary. We note, too, that the Master of the Rolls has been sitting for several days at the Privy Council, which certainly indicates "something rotten in the state" of his paper. Besides this, the courts, at a time when the pressure of business is very slight, sit habitually to a much later hour than formerly, when suitors had ample reason to complain of delay. The late Vice-Chancellor of England was accustomed to rise punctually at 3. With Vice-Chancellor Wood to rise before 4 is exceptional. Even in the Divorce Court, where, from the want of sufficient judicial power the arrears of business have increased and are still increasing to an extent altogether unexpected by the Legislature, Sir Cresswell Cresswell has acceded to the suggestion that the Court shall rise as nearly as possible at half-past two on Saturdays. More than this, that grim Rhadamanthine tribunal, the Court of Insolvent Debtors, pauses, we understand, from its joyless labours at 2. In those dreariest realms, where the Commissioner castigatque auditque dolor, he then adjourns till Monday morning, and takes his half-holiday like a gentleman of the upper air. The Chancery Code (see Order xxxvii., Rule 2), recognises this half-holiday and enacts that service of all writs, &c., and other proceedings shall be made on Saturday "before two o'clock in the afternoon." Why, then, should the Chancery Courts alone refuse to concede to their practitioners that privilege which is now enjoyed by almost every other class of working-men?

If we must speak out, we do not consider even a close of work at half-past two on a Saturday any such very ample boon. Surely there is something of mockery in heralding forth a concession of a little more than one out of six hours as a half-holiday. What would the schoolboys say to such an interpretation of the good old term? During the present sittings, at all events, the Courts might well reserve Saturdays for unopposed and short matters, &c., which can be disposed of without much argument, and rise punctually at 1. In the winter months, the same considerations do not apply with equal force. "Marches out" are few and far between, instead of being, as now, the rule on a Saturday. Country excursions then present no special attractions; besides this, the business of the Courts, after the long vacation, is generally of a more important character, and the hour or two at the end of the week which we now claim, might well be restored to the judicial mind from November to March. It may be that the other equity judges do not feel themselves at liberty to concede an hour of the public time upon the mere intimation in a newspaper of the Chancellor's view, unsupported by the authority of a general order. But whatever official intimation, either public or private, may be requisite, we trust that Lord Westbury will not allow his concession to be confined to the court in which he presides.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. V.

Of the Doctrines of Foreign Tribunals.

The general principles on which in our own country the rights of the trader, whether a British subject or an alien friend, in the use of a trade mark have been protected, are recognised in the courts of justice both of America and of France. In America, as might be expected, frequent reference has been made, in the arguments and the decisions in cases of this class, to the doctrines of our courts on the subject; the exponents of the law, however, have, as it seems to me, derived considerable advantage in the precision with which they are enabled to lay down a rule by which their courts will be guided in granting or refusing relief from not being hampered by previous decisions. We see in our own courts a constant endeavour to limit the equitable jurisdiction to the principles laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Blanchard v. Hill; and though the good sense of later judges has at length firmly established the jurisdiction on a wider basis, I think no one who reads their decisions will fail to be struck by a species of timidity in their expressions, by an anxiety to guard against anything like a recognition of property in a trade-mark, although in fact some of these very decisions can only be supported by reference to the general right of a court of equity to interfere for the protection of property against injury. This general principle has, however, been fully recognised in the American courts. Mr. Justice Story (Comm. Eq. Jur. s. 947, seqq.) places injunctions granted in restraint of an alleged violation of a trade-mark together with cases of piracy of dramatic works, publication from notes of an oral lecture without the author's permission, publication of private letters, or engravings, under the general head of protection to property. In Coffeen v. Brunton, 5 McLean 256, the principles by which the American courts will be guided are stated in the following words, "To entitle a complainant to protection against a false representation it is not essential that the article should be inferior in quality, or that the individual should fraudulently represent it so as to impose upon the public; but if by representation it be so assimilated as to be taken in the market for an established manufacture or compound of another, the injured party is entitled to an injunction." In the case of Partridge v. Menh, 2 Sand. Ch. 622, the right of a trader in the use of his mark is regarded as a species of goodwill which he acquires in his business (which is undoubtedly a proprietary right); and it is said that by the appropriation to himself of a particular label, sign, or mark, indicating that the article is made or sold by him, or by his authority, or that he carries on business at a particular place, he is entitled to protection against one who attempts to pirate upon the goodwill of his friends or customers, or the patrons of his trade or business, by using such label, sign, or trade-mark without his authority.

I have before (sup. p. 487) referred to the case of Howard v. Henriquez, which certainly carries the jurisdiction to its limit; for it appears that in that case the proprietor of an hotel called the "Irving House," or "Irving Hotel," obtained an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the same title for his place of business, although the name did not appear upon any part of the building of the plaintiff. The case of Colladay v. Baird, decided in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, and recently reported in this Journal (sup. p. 543), enters very fully into the reported cases, as well English as American, on this subject; and while it recognizes the principle that a manufacturer, though having no copyright in a label, may adopt a trade-mark which so far becomes his own property as to entitle him to the protection of the courts of law and equity, yet admits the possibility of cases arising in which one trader may use a name adopted by another as a trade-mark, and yet not interfere with his legal or equitable rights. No one, indeed, will be disposed to deny this, or to assert that a manufacturer can, by the use of a name, obtain an absolute right in it as a name merely; "it is only when a name is printed in a particular manner upon a particular label, and thus becomes identified with a particular style of goods, or where a name is used by a defendant in connection with his place of business (and not his manufactured goods), under such circumstances as to deceive the public, and to rob another of his individuality, and thus destroy his goods and injure his profits, that it becomes a trade-mark, or in the nature of a trade-mark, and as such entitles its possessor or proprietor to the protection of the courts of justice." These words (quoted from the report of the lastly-mentioned case), agree very closely with the definition of the right of property in a trade-mark, which I have ventured to lay down, and do, in fact, recognize its qualities as property of a peculiar sort. There are other cases in the American reports to which I will only refer (Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sand. Ch. 599; Clench v. Maddick, 16 Leg. Int. 236; Dayton v. Wilkes, ib. 292; Coats v. Piatte, 19 Leg. Int. 213; Davis v. Kendall, 11 Am. L. Reg. 680). The case of Taylor v. Carpenter (2 Sand. 603), is valuable inasmuch as it shows that the courts of the United States will grant an injunction to a native of this country against one of their own subjects, to restrain an infringement of the right to a trade-mark, although it was, in that case, argued on the alleged authority of Delondre v. Shaw, that the English courts would not grant relief to a foreigner for such a violation of his rights, and that the trade-marks of Englishmen in the United States were, therefore, not entitled to protection. In the judgment in this case, however, it was admitted that Delondre v. Shaw lays down no such rule, but rather that the English courts will always restrain the fraudulent sale of a spurious article; the greatest abhorrence is expressed of the doctrine that fraud by a citizen should be sanctioned because it was practised on a foreigner in the prosecution of a legitimate business within the American jurisdiction, or that a suitor should be denied the ordinary remedy to protect him in the enjoyment of his rights because he is a foreigner; and it is truly said that every dictate of enlightened wisdom requires that a foreigner, especially in a commercial country, shall be entitled to the same protection of his rights as a citizen.

The French law, while it differs in some minor points from our own, fully recognises the existence of property in a name or mark; and a right of action for damages for an injury done to this species of property by a copying or colourable imitation of the name or mark. The general principles of the law are to be found in the "Diet. de Droit Commercial Art. Nom.," by M. M. Gouget and Merger, from which the following remarks are translated and adapted.

A trader acquires a property in the name which he affixes to articles of his manufacture, whether it be his own name, or a fanciful designation to recommend them to the public; so also, in the case of wrappers or labels, these distinctive marks become the property of the trader, and give him a right of action against any rival in trade who may pirate them, for the purpose of misleading purchasers, and also against any person who may aid or abet such piracy. On these principles, it has been decided that a printer has no right to hand over the labels of a house of business, except on the demand of the house itself, or of some person duly authorised by it; and that he is liable for damages for handing such labels over to unauthorised persons, and that it makes no difference that they are to be used in another country. [This doctrine is certainly opposed to what has been laid down in our courts, for Lord Cranworth in Farina v. Silverlock, 6 De G. M. & G. 214, recognises the right of a printer to print and sell generally such labels, and that there may be a legitimate trade in them with persons other than the original proprietor.]

So also with painted signs, or escutcheons, and with names and marks on carriages. In short, with any external mark which a trader may use to distinguish his goods, the use of which by other parties gives a fair ground for presuming an intention on their part to appropriate to themselves his advantage in the market.

We must not, however, forget that the French law draws a distinction between such names and signs as I have enumerated above, and those which are more specially termed marques de fabriques, or trade marks. All the remarks which I shall make here allude to the former class of marks only, the latter being subject to certain provisions for deposit and registration, in virtue of which only they are legally cognisable. In fact, they correspond more nearly, as far as the principles extend on which the right to use them is founded, with books, &c., and inventions, which are, in our country, the subject of copyright or of a patent.

The French law does not look upon the names and signs which are comprised under the former of these two heads as so important as the marques de fabriques, or trade marks. It protects them, however, against any attempted violation, direct or indirect, on the ground of the right to protection which the credit of every trader enjoys. This implies that there must be a possibility of damage, as we have seen in our own law. The imitation, therefore, must be such as to be likely to deceive.

In France the action is brought, as in our own country, by the proprietor of the trade mark; and in considering how this proprietary right has arisen, the very important question is involved, whether or no it can be possessed by a foreigner. I have not been able to find out that this point is definitely settled, although the balance of authority certainly leads me to conclude the right of a foreigner would, as in our own courts and in America, be protected in France. On the one hand, it is said that this right to protection is grounded either on the general right, in which case, according to the 11th & 13th articles of the Civil Code, an alien in France only enjoys those civil rights which are reciprocally given to French subjects by treaty with the nation of the alien; so that, for an English subject, there would be no such right, although it may be questioned whether, under the provisions of the new commercial treaty, even on this ground an English subject might not succeed in maintaining such a right; or it depends on the special law by which an action for damages is given for the fraudulent use of the name of a manufacturer to his injury, and that this law does not expressly include aliens; so limiting the jurisdiction in a manner exactly analogous to that which was followed in the case of Jeffreys v. Boosey. So far, however, as the decisions of the Royal Courts of Paris and Rouen extend as an authority, the jurisdiction is placed upon a broader and sounder basis. Admitting that aliens are to be excluded from those civil rights which are the mere creations of French law, they are still entitled to enjoy such as arise out of natural law, or the law of nations, the existence of which the French law recognises, and the exercise of which it regulates. The principle that every injury demands a reparation from the person committing it, is certainly one of these natural rights, and is sanctioned, though by no means created, by French law. This maxim of natural equity is not limited in application, it governs the rights of aliens as well as of native-born subjects; the only case in which it may cease to become applicable is where a special law regulates the enjoyment of certain rights, in virtue of which alone, over-riding the natural law, those rights exist. The property of a trader in his name is universally recognised, though this may be and is regulated in France by certain special laws (the law of July 28, 1824, and the law of the 22nd Germinal Ann. 11.) These are to be considered only as acting in aid of and not as over-riding the natural law. In short it is stated, that an alien bringing into France a trade or any manufactured article, ought to be protected equally with a French subject; that the rules of equity are universal, and that therefore the French tribunals are bound not to allow the consumer to be taken in by fraudulent speculations; and that these general principles cannot be controlled in their application by any general laws.

We see, therefore, that on the whole the same spirit has inspired the decisions of both the American and the French courts with that which dictated the judgment in the cases of the Collins Company (vide sup. p. 569.) There can be no doubt that the principle laid down there is a just one—that for a personal wrong, and the piracy of a trade-mark is such,—the alien as well as the native subject is entitled to a remedy in the courts of the country where the wrong is committed.

CHANCERY PRACTICE.—ENFORCING DECREES AND ORDERS.

We have already noticed the provisions of the practice introduced in August, 1841, with reference to the enforcement of decrees and orders, and suggested a more extended application of the principle involved in such provisions. We now pursue the subject.

The full benefit of the provisions referred to has not yet been applied to cases where the decree or order is to be enforced against a corporation. Previously to August, 1841, a writ of execution, attachment, attachment with proclamation, commission of rebellion, and serjeant-at-arms, were necessary preliminary steps in process of contempt before sequestration could, in ordinary cases, be obtained. Since that time, and in such cases, service of the order or decree has taken the place of the writ of execution; and sequestration has been obtainable upon the sheriff's return to the first attachment. But the practice introduced in 1841 has been applied to corporations only to the extent of substituting service of the order in lieu of the writ of execution. In all other respects the practice in such cases has continued as before. For instance, to obtain sequestration for breach of an order or decree against a corporation, the following preliminary steps are necessary:—A copy of the order must be served personally upon the secretary or other person acting officially for the corporation. Then a distringas is issued. If the sheriff returns "nulla bona," an alias distringas is issued. If the sheriff again returns "nulla bona," a pluries distringas is issued. And if the sheriff still returns "nulla bona," upon such third return of "nulla bona," an order nisi for sequestration may be obtained. But if the sheriff returns "issues forty shillings" to the first or either of the subsequently issued writs of distringas, upon such return an order nisi for sequestration may be obtained. See Harvey v. The East India Co., 2 Vernon, 395; and Lowther v. The Mayor, &c., of Colchester, 3 Merivale, 543.

We are unable to trace the origin of the practice. Very little information respecting it is to be gleaned from existing works upon the subject—and this observation applies equally to the standard works on sheriff law as to other works on the general practice of the Court. We have consulted many volumes of such works—some very old—and in every instance we find the practice stated just as concisely as it is stated in the modern books of practice. Its origin, the reasons for its adoption, or detailed information as to how such writs should be executed, are points barely touched upon. Hence a case which came under our notice very recently did not at all surprise us. In executing a distringas founded on a contempt, the sheriff's officer dealt with it as he would have dealt with a fi. fa. He sought to levy the whole amount in respect of which the writ issued, and remained in possession six or seven days, and there being even then no goods upon which a distraint could be made, he returned the writ "nulla bona,"—a return which he might and should have made immediately upon his entry. And, in the same case, the like proceeding was repeated with an alias distringas, thus delaying justice to the parties, and involving them in unnecessary expense. The number of steps in the process seems to be in imitation of the process formerly sued forth against ordinary parties, and the origin of the former practice, as against ordinary parties, is, perhaps, traceable to the source indicated by Gilbert in his "Forum Ro- manum." In that work he shows that the usual steps in process of contempt as applied by the Court of Chancery were in imitation of the old canon and civil law. On page 32 he says, "By the canon law, the defendant was to be thrice cited, or else per unum peremptorium, and then, if he did not appear, he was pronounced contumax." In page 33 he speaks of the citation in civil cases of a defaulting defendant, and, in page 34, says, "If this citation be from the prince, then the very first is peremptory, and if the person does not appear, he is contumax." The subpoena is with us the citation, and if the defendant does not duly appear upon it, he is contumax of course, because this is a citation from the prince." He then mentions the subsequent steps necessary to be taken to enforce obedience, viz., attachment, attachment with proclamation, serjeant-at-arms, and sequestration—adding, in page 35, "so that they had three real citations before they came to sequestration." But so very little information being procurable respecting the writ of distringas founded on a contempt, it is difficult to say how far any modification of the existing practice might affect the principle upon which such process is founded, and, therefore, in suggesting any such modification, we must be chiefly guided by an endeavour to assimilate the practice in such cases to the improved general practice, applicable to the enforcement of decrees and orders.

It would very much simplify the practice if the course of procedure against corporations were the same as against persons having privilege of peerage or of Parliament. In some respects they stand in a like position. Neither can be held to obedience by personal arrest. Formerly, in case of contempt against peers, a writ of attachment was actually sealed and entered (though not executed) to ground a sequestration upon:—See Gilbert's "Forum Romanum," page 67. The attachment has, however, long since been dispensed with in such cases, and an order nisi for a sequestration may now be obtained at once upon proof of service of the decree—and we think that like facilities might be afforded as against corporations. Under Rule 4 of Order 30 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 94, service of the decree or order binds the party to obedience, and is a sufficient foundation for process of contempt—and, thus far, the provisions of such rule have been applied to corporations in accordance with Article 3 of Rule 10 of the Preliminary Order, p. 5. Do the writs of distringas answer any other purpose than that of holding the party to obedience? The distringas on a contempt is not a writ remedial for actual recovery of money due. The sheriff is not bound to levy the whole amount in respect of which the writ issues. The levy under the first distringas, of "issues 40s." only is regular, see Lowther v. The Mayor &c. of Colchester, 3 Merivale, 543. The amount levied is merely in the nature of a fine or amercement, and to distress the parties in their possession until obedience rendered. And it appears from Tidd's Practice, 8th edition, (1840) pp. 34, 36, that in the writ of distringas issued to compel appearance the amount of the issues (limited to 40s.) was specified in the writ, shewing, evidently, that the amount levied was not to satisfy the party, but only to hold the defaulting party to obedience—and the writ of distringas founded on a contempt of the Court of Chancery, and issued against a corporation likewise merely holds the parties to obedience and distresses them in their possession in order to enforce that obedience. The alias distringas does no more. The pluries distringas does no more. In fact, when the three writs have been issued and executed, nothing more is done than is effected by service of the decree, which service, under Rule 4 of Order 30, itself binds the party to obedience. But, if an order nisi for sequestration may not be obtained upon proof of service of the decree, and thus the writs of distringas be dispensed with altogether, we think that the alias and pluries writs might be dispensed with, and that such a modification of the practice would be in harmony with the modern practice as applied to ordinary cases. Under Rule 8 of Order 29 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 89, applicable to ordinary cases, sequestration may be obtained upon the sheriff's return to the first attachment, and even upon the first return non est inventus. If sequestration absolute may, in ordinary cases, be obtained upon the first return non est inventus to an attachment, why may not an order nisi for sequestration against a corporation be obtained upon the first return "nulla bona" to a distringas? This would harmonize the practice. And we conceive that such a modification would be in accordance with the spirit and intent of Rule 3 of Order 29, and, if in accordance, its application would be authorised by article 3 of Rule 10 of the Preliminary Order, which article expressly provides that the word "person" or "party" shall include a body politic or corporate. It is considered that although a party may issue and execute the three writs of distringas against a corporation, he can, nevertheless, recover 13s. 8d. only as the "fixed" costs of contempt. If such opinion be correct, it supplies an additional reason for the adoption of our suggestion—for it were certainly inconsistent to require a party to issue and execute three writs and yet allow to him the costs of one only.

Of course, if the modification of the practice suggested be at any time made, it will be applicable alike to all cases of contempt against corporate bodies.

There is another writ which deserves notice. We allude to the writ of assistance—a writ issued to enforce the delivery of possession of land, &c. In Lord Bacon's time the issuing of this writ was preceded by writ of execution, then the ordinary process of contempt to commission of rebellion, and the serjeant-at-arms and injunction. (See "Beame's Orders," p. 6). Since August, 1841, all these preliminaries have been dispensed with—but delay and expense still attend the obtainment of the writ. It is still requisite to apply for an order for the writ. The application is by motion in court, ex parte, and is granted as of course, upon proof, by affidavit, of personal service of the order directing delivery of possession. (See Rule 5 Order 29 Consol. Gen. Ord. p. 90). The main part of the order thus granted simply directs that the writ do issue. In all other respects it is a repetition of the previous order. The order for the writ being granted as of course, no further notice is given to the party affected by and we think that the object might be as effectually accomplished, if words to the following effect were inserted in the order directing delivery of possession, and which is served upon the party, viz. "And in default thereof it is ordered that a writ of assistance directed to the sheriff of ——— do forthwith issue to put the said ——— into such possession as aforesaid, without further order." The only needful variation in the writ would consist in the omission of the recital of the separate order directing the writ to issue.

We suggest, too, that the copy of the order served should, in these cases, be endorsed with a notice or memorandum showing the liabilities consequent upon disobedience—thus assimilating the practice to the general practice of the Court as applied to other cases.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—SECOND COURT.

July 2.—Miller v. Atherton.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who is an attorney in the City, to recover damages for slanderous words used by the defendant concerning the plaintiff. The defendant merely pleaded "Not guilty."

According to the plaintiff's case, he was attending at the Bankruptcy Court as a solicitor on behalf of the bankrupt and the creditors. The defendant attended to prove a debt under the bankruptcy. The plaintiff required to see the securities he held, when the defendant called the plaintiff a pettifogging lawyer, a dirty sweep, a rogue, a — rascal, and added that he should be able to prove him such. The plaintiff told the defendant if he had used that language in any other place he would have pulled his nose. On the following day the plaintiff wrote to the defendant demanding an apology, but, receiving no answer, the present action was brought with a view of vindicating the plaintiff's character, and it was stated that if the defendant would then make a retraction the plaintiff would be satisfied. No apology, however, being offered, the case proceeded. The words, as alleged, were proved to have been used in the Bankruptcy Court when it was crowded with people.

On behalf of the defendant, it was contended that the words were mere vulgar abuse, used by an angry and passionate man.

The jury retired for a short time, and then returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 40s.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Sittings at Nisi Prius, at Guildhall, before Mr. Justice HILL and a Special Jury.)

July 3.—The Queen v. Blundell.—This was an indictment, charging the defendant with having threatened to publish certain libels against James Bell, with intent to extort money from James Bell and others. It further charged the defendant with having published certain libels, knowing the charges therein contained to be false. The defendant pleaded "Not guilty" generally, and some of the charges he justified on the ground of their being true.

It appeared from the statement of the plaintiff's counsel that the prosecutor, James Bell, was a solicitor, residing at Surbiton, but also carrying on business in Leadenhall-street; he was also clerk to the magistrates of the Kingston division. The defendant, Mr. Blundell, was also an attorney. The prosecution was instituted in consequence of a series of libels published during a number of years, and which had gone to such an extent that Mr. Bell found it absolutely necessary to adopt this proceeding in order to vindicate his character, and prevent the defendant from continuing to annoy him. In 1850 Mr. Bell was the London agent to an attorney in the country, who had brought an action against Mr. Blundell at the instance of a Mr. Browne. The case was tried at Gloucester, and a verdict for the plaintiff, with £50 damages, was given. After the trial Mr. Blundell had written a letter to the attorney in the cause, offering peace. Mr. Browne afterwards brought an action against Mr. Blundell, when the jury gave £300 damages. After this action Mr. Blundell frequently called upon Mr. Bell with a view of obtaining time for the payment of the damages and costs. He was ultimately taken in execution. This gave rise to some ill-feeling on the part of Mr. Blundell, and in July, 1855, he commenced a series of libels against Mr. Bell. In the first letter he called upon him to pay him £1,500 of which he alleged he had been despoiled, and also to make an apology. If he received these within 10 days he would expose him and his confederates no further. Mr. Blundell then wrote a circular to the county court judges, the leaders on the Oxford Circuit, and others. In this circular he particularly mentioned the late Serjeant M. R. Clark and Mr. John Gray. Other libels followed, and on the 7th of November, 1859, Mr. Blundell wrote a letter to the Kingston bench of magistrates in which he said of Mr. Bell that he knew him to be a plausible, well-dressed, respectably-connected, and decently-attired, scoundrel, capable of any roguery, and he would not credit his testimony uncorroborated. Mr. Blundell also wrote to the Secretary of State complaining of the conduct of the Kingston magistrates. This conduct was inquired into, and the explanation was perfectly satisfactory. Mr. Blundell had been asked to apologize, but this he had refused to do, and said he would facilitate any proceeding that might be adopted against him. He also said that he had for a short time suspended practice in order that he might have time to castigate Mr. Bell and his confederates, and he added that he should be at Surbiton for a few days, and should not be inactive. To bring an action against such a man would be useless, and therefore the present proceeding by indictment was instituted.

The learned JUDGE having summed up,

The jury returned a verdict of "guilty" of sending a threatening letter, but not with a view of extorting money, and "guilty" on the other counts.

The CROWN prayed judgment.

The JUDGE said, in the present state of the record, there having been some demurrers, he could not pass judgment. The defendant must be brought up for judgment next term.

Sir William Atherton has been appointed Attorney-General in succession to the present Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Q.C., who has been appointed to the office of Solicitor-General, will become a candidate for the representation of Richmond, Yorkshire, which is vacant by the resignation of Mr. Henry Rich. A writ for the election was ordered on the 4th inst., and by Tuesday or Wednesday next, the new Solicitor-General will in all probability have taken his seat for the borough.

Mr. Joseph George Wilson, of Alfreton, Derbyshire, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. HADFIELD asked the noble lord at the head of the Government, whether it was intended to proceed with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill this session, and on what day he would proceed, if such was his intention.

Lord PALMERSTON said that it was the intention of the Government to proceed with this Bill; but that as it involved legal considerations, he would not name a day for bringing it on until the law officers were in the House, which he trusted would be very shortly.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (MONEY) BILL.

This Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a select committee, with an instruction to consider the question of site.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

Mr. WALPOLE moved the second reading of this Bill, which had come down from the Lords, and the principle of which is contained in the first and second clauses. The first provided that no charge should be preferred against a person by going behind his back to a grand jury in the first instance, when there was an opportunity of going to a trained professional magistrate, who could understand the charge, and see whether it was of such a nature and supported by such proofs as rendered it proper that the person charged should be sent to trial. The second clause enacted that when a charge was investigated by a justice of peace, in open court, it should no longer be necessary to go to the grand jury. The main objection which was urged against the Bill was that it tended to supersede the grand jury system; and in that case, it was asked, what was to be done with a class of offences called political offences, in respect to which the grand jury system had acted as a shield of protection, and as a barrier between the Crown and the subject? His answer to that objection was that the 8th clause of the Bill provided for that class of offences, and if the clause should not be deemed sufficient for the purpose it could be amended in the committee. It was said, and truly said, that the grand jury system had been a great protection to the people of this country against improper accusations, and against the undue exercise of power on the part of persons in authority; if there was anything in the Bill which could supersede that system, he for one would not move the second reading. But what ground was there for such an apprehension, when in fact the grand jury system would, under the present Bill, be as complete in the country as now, and when political cases in the metropolitan district were by the 8th clause excepted from the operation of the present Bill? Fifty years ago, the criminal law commissioners considered this subject, and directed questions to be put to a vast number of persons—judges, magistrates, barristers, recorders, solicitors, and other persons acquainted with the practice of the criminal courts, and there was scarcely an answer given which did not amount to an acknowledgment that in the metropolis the grand jury system was in almost all cases superfluous, and in many cases was very mischievous. [The right hon. gentleman, in support of this statement, quoted the opinions expressed by the late Lord Denman, Sir J. Patteson, and in various presentments by grand juries at the Middlesex Sessions and Central Criminal Court.] In reply to the objection that there were no stipendiary magistrates in the city of London, or in those districts subject to the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, he observed that from all he could learn, the clerks who assisted the mayor and aldermen in the discharge of their magisterial duties in the city were men of so much ability and experience that there would be in their case no greater risk of a miscarriage in the administration of justice under the operation of the Bill than in those instances in which the stipendiary magistrates were the persons presiding. Having made these observations, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. AYRTON contended that it was, at the present late period of the session, impossible to do justice to the important question which the right hon. gentleman had submitted to the notice of the House, and that it would be extremely undesirable to proceed with the Bill at a moment when there was no opportunity of learning with respect to it the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. While admitting that the number of grand juries summoned in the metropolis might be looked upon as a great evil, he could not concur with the right hon. gentleman as to the expediency of asking hon. members to assent to a measure which was calculated entirely to subvert the existing system of administering justice as that which was now proposed. He was also prepared to maintain that however much the right hon. gentleman might endeavour to separate the metropolis from the rest of England, yet the principle which he advocated was in the main applicable to grand juries throughout the country at large. The grand jury system, at all events, afforded a guarantee that no man would be put on his trial for felony unless his case had undergone a preliminary ordeal, and twelve men of repute had declared it to be one which demanded fuller investigation. There was at the present moment no very strong feeling against the continuance of grand juries, and he felt it, under those circumstances, to be his duty to object to the course which the right hon. gentleman was taking.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said he was prepared to give his vote for the second reading of the Bill. He thought that there was sufficient ground for the establishment of a distinction between the metropolis and the country with respect to grand juries, and he saw no reason why the House should not at once agree to the Bill.

Mr. B. JOHNSTONE supported the Bill.

Mr. HUNT would deprecate the passing almost sub silentio of a Bill which proposed to disturb an integral part of our criminal jurisprudence. He could not help thinking that the Bill was fraught with the greatest danger to the liberty of the subject and the cause of justice. The grand jury system had come down to us from our forefathers, and he had no fear that it would be parted with lightly as long as the names of Jeffries and Scroggs were remembered by the English people. The hon. gentleman, in the absence of Mr. M'Mahon, concluded by moving as an amendment that the Bill should be read a second time upon that day three months.

Sir M. RIDLEY seconded the amendment.

On the motion of Mr. NEWDEGATE the debate was adjourned.

Thursday, July 4.

THE LAW OF LUNACY.

The HOME SECRETARY having taken his seat while the hon. member for Bristol was addressing the House,

Mr. TITE, pursuant to notice, asked the right hon. gentleman whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill this session for amending the laws relating to lunatics in England, as recommended by the select committee of last year; and, if not, whether it was their intention to proceed with the Bill of the late Lord Chancellor which had been sent down from the House of Lords, having for its object the amendment of the laws relating to the lunatics under the care of the Court of Chancery.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said he intended to proceed with the Bill which had come down from the House of Lords with reference to Chancery lunatics. The report of the select committee had reference to lunatics generally, particularly to criminal lunatics, and they recommended an alteration and also a consolidation of the existing law. He was afraid that even if he laid on the table a Bill to carry out their suggestions it would be impossible that it could pass this session. The measure which had come down from the House of Lords, and with which he would proceed, was simply confined to Chancery lunatics.

CHANCERY LUNATICS BILL.

On the motion of Sir G. C. LEWIS, this Bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

COPYRIGHT OF DESIGNS BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

EQUITY.

RIGHT OF LIEN ON PAPERS WHERE SOLICITOR DISCHARGES CLIENT.

Rawlinson v. Moss, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 733.

In the case of Colegrave v. Manley (1 Turn. & Russ. 400), Lord Eldon held that the sale of his business by a solicitor amounted to a discharge by the solicitor of himself from the client's employ. Where the solicitor thus discharges himself the rule as to the use of papers is quite different from what it is where the solicitor is discharged by the client. The suitor in the former case is entitled, in Lord Eldon's words, "to have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity, and as little expense, as if the connection of solicitor and client had not been dissolved." In another case Lord Eldon intimated a doubt whether a solicitor discharging himself could claim a lien—"an expression which," as Lord Cottenham says, in the case to which we shall next refer, "must be understood as meaning not that the solicitor loses the lien altogether, but that he cannot set it up so as to prevent the client from proceeding in the cause." Acting upon the principle thus laid down, Lord Cottenham, in Heslop v. Metcalfe (3 My. & Cr. 183), made an order on a solicitor, who withdrew from the conduct of the plaintiff's cause, that he should deliver up to the plaintiff's new solicitor all such papers and documents connected with the cause as, upon inspection, such new solicitor might deem necessary for the hearing, without prejudice to any right of lien for costs, and upon an undertaking to return such papers and documents after the hearing. Lord Cottenham, in his judgment in that case, said, "I think the principle should be, that the solicitor claiming the lien should have every security not inconsistent with the progress of the cause. But it is clear that there will neither be, to use the expression of Lord Eldon, the same ease and celerity, nor as little expense, in the conduct of it, if the new solicitor is merely to have access to the papers, as when they are placed in his hands upon his undertaking to restore them after the immediate purposes of the production have been served." It should be observed that, in this case, there was a withdrawal in fact by the solicitor in consequence of the non-payment of his bill. In the case of Griffiths v. Griffiths (2 Hare 587), a party had employed, as his solicitors in a cause, a firm of two solicitors in partnership, and it was held that the retirement from the business of one of such partners, under an arrangement with the other, operated as a discharge of the client by the solicitors. This being so, it followed that the client was entitled to require that the papers in the cause, necessary for its prosecution, should be delivered up to his new solicitor, upon the usual undertaking for saving the lien of the discharged solicitors. Sir James Wigram's reasoning in this case was, that where a person employs two solicitors who are partners, he stipulates for the activity and services of both. If, then, the withdrawal of one partner from the contract had taken place by arrangement between the two, for purposes of their own, no obligation to one alone could remain upon the party with whom the two made the contract, nor could he be compelled to rely upon the responsibility of one alone. The principle would be the same whether the retiring or the continuing partner happened to be more or less conversant with the particular business. The retirement of one partner had the effect of discharging himself and the other partner as solicitors in the cause; and, therefore, the client was entitled to the benefit of the rule applicable where the relation of solicitor and client is terminated by the act of the solicitor.

In the two cases last referred to the order was made in a pending cause for the conduct of which the papers were required. In the case which has suggested this article, the suit was between solicitors for a dissolution of partnership, and an order was made in it dealing with the papers and documents of clients required in the conduct of conveyancing and other business. It appears, therefore, that the rule laid down in previous cases applies equally, whatever be the kind of business for which the papers are required. It appears, also, that the dissolution of a partnership by decree of the court operates, like a dissolution by mutual consent, as a discharge of the client by the solicitor, and entitles the client to the full benefit of the above-stated rule, as to the convenient use of his papers, notwithstanding the lien of the solicitors.

INVESTMENT OF FUND IN COURT IN EAST INDIA STOCK.

Cockburn v. Peel, L. C. & LL.J., 9 W. R. 725.

The petitioner in this case was entitled for life to the dividends of a sum of Three per Cent. Annuities, standing in trust in the cause, to which her infant children were entitled in remainder after her decease. The petition prayed that the fund in court might be transferred into East India Stock. The Court refused to make the order. The late Lord Chancellor was desirous, if possible, to lay down some general rule as to such applications, but, on consideration, he thought that "the Court could not safely lay down any more precise rule than that, in the absence of any special circumstances which might make the transfer asked by the tenant for life beneficial to those in remainder, irrespective of pecuniary calculations, the transfer ought not to be permitted, if, on pecuniary calculations, it may be injurious to those in remainder." It had been proposed to guard against the risk of loss in case the East India Stock should be redeemed by establishing a sinking fund; but the Court did not approve of that expedient. There was no suggestion of advantage to the children from the proposed change. Lord Justice Turner said it was in the power of the Court to make the order; but also in the discretion of the Court whether to make it or not.

In the previous case of The Equitable Assurance Company v. Fuller, 9 W. R. 400, the application was by the settlor, and Vice-Chancellor Wood came very reluctantly to the conclusion that he could not refuse to make the order, as it was the duty of the Court to carry out the General Order of the 1st February, 1861. He said it was not necessary to consider what might be the decision where the application was by a person who had not created the trust. The recent case before the full Court of Appeal was of this character, and we see that the application has been refused. But it does not seem satisfactory to make the difference between the two decisions depend upon this distinction. Indeed, in Bishop v. Bishop, 9 W. R. 549, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley treated this distinction as unimportant. Probably if the case before Vice-Chancellor Wood had come before the full Court, there would have been a disposition quite as strong as was felt by him to refuse the application, and also less hesitation in assuming the authority to refuse it. It is important to observe that, notwithstanding the late decision, trustees making a change of investment in good faith, will be entitled to the protection of the Court.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

Thompson v. Thompson, M. R., 9 W. R. 728.

In the 47th chapter of Mr. Jarman's "Treatise on Wills," the subject of the above case is treated with the author's usual clearness. He says, that one of the questions which arise under gifts to survivors is, whether they mean survivors indefinitely, or survivors at some specific point of time. In seeking for a period to which the words of survivorship could be referred, the obvious rule, where the gift took effect in possession immediately on the testator's decease, was to treat these words as intended to provide against the death of the objects in the lifetime of the testator. Where, however, the gift was not immediate, there being a prior life or other particular interest carved out, so that there was another period to which the words in question could be referred, the point was one of greater difficulty. In these cases, as well as in those of the other class, the courts for a long period uniformly applied the words of survivorship to the death of the testator. The latest case in which this rule was applied to a bequest of personal estate, was that of Brown v. Bigg (7 Ves. 279), where a testator gave the interest of his personal estate to his wife for life, and after her decease he gave the capital to his several nephews and nieces therein named, "to be divided amongst them, and the survivors of them, share and share alike." A niece having died in the lifetime of the widow, her personal representative claimed her share as vested at the decease of the testator, and Sir William Grant so decreed. This and many other cases might seem to have established that a gift to several objects as tenants in common, and the survivors and survivor of them, vested the subject of gift absolutely in the objects living at the death of the testator, the words of survivorship being referable to that period. "The sequel," says Mr. Jarman, "will serve to show that no rule of construction, however sanctioned by repeated adoption, is secure of permanence, unless founded in principle." To the inadequacy of the grounds on which the rule was established, may be ascribed the frequent agitation of the question, and the numerous exceptions engrafted upon the rule, which at length occasioned its total subversion, at least as regards personal estate. Mr. Jarman thinks that a perusal of the later cases will bring the reader to the conclusion that "where there is a gift of personal estate to a person for life, or any other limited interest, and after the determination of such interest to certain persons nominatim, or to a class of persons, as tenants in common, and the survivors of them, these words are construed as intended to carry the subject of gift to the objects who are living at the period of distribution." The first of the cases which suggest this conclusion is that of Cripps v. Wolcott, 4 Madd. 11, where the testatrix gave and appointed her real and personal estate in trust for her husband for life, and after his decease she directed that her personal estate should be equally divided between her two sons, A. & B., and C., her daughter, and the survivors or survivor of them, share and share alike. A. died in the lifetime of the husband. B. & C., as the survivors at his death, claimed the whole. Sir John Leach considered that "there being no special intent to be found in the will, the terms of survivorship were to be referred to the death of the husband, who took a previous estate for life." Among numerous recent cases to the same effect, it may suffice to refer to that of Neathway v. Reed, 3 D. M. & G. 18, decided by the full Court of Appeal in 1853. In that case the testatrix gave thus:—"To my sister C. N.'s surviving children, £30 each." She then gave to C. N. thus:—"The interest of my funded property for and during her natural life, and after her decease, such property to be equally divided between her surviving children." It was held that though, on the construction of the word "surviving" in the first clause, the period of distribution was referable to the death of the testatrix, yet that the period of distribution in the last clause was to be referred to the death of C. N., and that those children only who survived C. N. were entitled. The result of all these cases is stated by Mr. Jarman thus: "The rule which reads a gift to survivors simply as applying to objects living at the death of the testator, is confined to those cases in which there is no other period to which survivorship can be referred; and where such gift is preceded by a life or other prior interest, it takes effect in favour of those who survive the period of distribution, and of those only." It must be remembered, however, that cases not yet overruled forbid the confident application of this rule to devises of real estate.

In the case before us, the testator bequeathed to his wife for her life all his interest in a leasehold house, and at her death he directed the same to be disposed of for the benefit of his surviving children, share and share alike. The testator left seven children, of whom three died in the lifetime of the widow, who was now dead. The Master of the Rolls held that the four children who survived her were entitled to the property. He said that all the modern authorities went in one line, and this case was governed by them.

COMMON LAW.

ADMITTANCE AFTER TERM—23 & 24 VICT. c. 127, s. 12.

Re — M.A., an Articled Clerk, B. C., 9 W. R. 639.

The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act of last year contains (s. 12) a provision to the effect that, whenever the period of service under articles expires in time of vacation, the articled clerk may pass his examination in the term preceding such vacation; and may be admitted, enrolled, and sworn in, at any time in or after such vacation, upon proving, by affidavit or otherwise, that his period of clerkship has expired.

The utility of this enactment is shown by the present case, in which a question arose whether certain articles expired on the last day of term, or on the day which immediately followed the last day of term. The service was for the period of three years from the date of the articles; and the Court held that in computing the time, the day of their date must be included, which made the articles not to expire until the 9th of May, Easter Term in the present year having ended on the 8th of the month. Under these circumstances, the Court authorized the admission to be made in the vacation under the above provision, though it appears that this permission was not in fact acted on.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—ORDER OF PROTECTION NOT RETROSPECTIVE IN ITS EFFECT.

The Midland Railway Co., Appellants, v. Pye, Respondent, C. P., 9 W. R. 658.

This case raises and disposes of the question whether the 21st clause in the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 (the statute establishing the new Divorce Court), was intended to have a retrospective effect. This provision enables a wife who has been deserted by her husband to obtain an "order of protection" with regard to money or property thereafter acquired by her own lawful industry, and property which she may become possessed of after such desertion, against her husband or persons claiming under him; and the clause declares that during the continuance of such order the wife shall "be and be deemed to have been during such desertion in the like position in all respects with regard to property, and contracts, and suing and being sued," as if she had obtained a decree of judicial separation. In the present case such an order was obtained by a married woman after she had commenced proceedings in her own name upon a cause of action accruing previously. These proceedings—her husband not being joined—she could not maintain, unless she was helped by the order of protection: but all the judges of the Common Pleas held that it could not have such auxiliary effect. It would, in the words of Chief Justice Erle, be giving "a monstrous effect" to the clause to construe it as making valid an action begun without the legal right to maintain it. It may be observed that Mr. Justice Byles (while concurring in the general judgment of the Court) stated that he was unable to reconcile the wording of the 21st section of which the effect is above given, with that of the 25th section, which says that in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall be considered as a feme sole with respect to after acquired, or devolving property from the date of the sentence, and during the continuance of the separation, and (sect. 26) shall be considered as a feme sole for certain purposes, and amongst others for suing and being sued.

Horwood v. Powell, B. C., 9 W. R. 659.

This case discloses a singular attempt at defeating a just claim by a piece of special pleading which was quietly submitted to by the magistrates, but was very properly set aside by Mr. Justice Wightman on appeal. The Turnpike Acts (3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 32, and 4 & 5 Vict. c. 33, s. 1) contain an exemption from payment of toll in respect of any horse, &c., which shall only cross any turnpike road, or shall not pass above one hundred yards thereon. In the present case a person when he came to the turnpike gate had only gone on the road a very few yards, and claimed to be exempted from the payment of toll thereat under the above proviso, contending that for any thing the toll-keeper could know he was not going on the other side of the gate a sufficient distance to make up the number of one hundred yards. This defence the magistrates considered a valid one, and dismissed an information which had been preferred for refusing the toll—although it appeared at the hearing that in point of fact the person informed against had, after forcing open the toll-gate, proceeded along the turnpike road several hundred yards. Mr. Justice Wightman held that as the traveller was prima facie liable to pay toll, it was for him to make out to the satisfaction of the toll-keeper that he came within the exception; and that the latter was entitled to demand and take the toll, at the peril of having to render it back again if he found that the payer left the road within the proscribed distance.

It may be convenient here to observe that there have in addition to the present case been recently two decisions upon the proper construction of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 32. In one of these (Gerrard v. Parker, 7 Ell. & Bl. 498) it was held that the exemption from toll therein given applies to the case of a travelling more than one hundred yards in the aggregate over two turnpike roads in the same trust so that one hundred yards on the same road be not passed over. In the other, Veitch v. Trustees of Exeter Roads, (8 Ell. & Bl. 986) it seems to be the opinion of the Court that the exemption may be claimed if the turnpike road be used at different times on each occasion to an extent less than one hundred yards, but being more than that distance when taken altogether—provided always there be not under the special circumstances of the case, an intent manifest to "evade the payment of toll" within the meaning of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 41.

Heys v. Tindall, Q. B., 9 W. R. 665.

This case will operate as a useful check upon house agents, in whom necessarily considerable confidence is reposed by the owners of that species of property; and it is (so far as we are aware) one prima impressionis. It appears to be an authority for the proposition that a house agent is obliged to use reasonable precautions with regard to the solvency of a person whom he procures his principal to take as tenant, and in respect of whom he has charged a commission. In the present case the person introduced by the agent was, to his knowledge, in insolvent circumstances, and the jury found—and the finding was supported by the ruling of the judge, and afterwards by the Court—that such conduct showed negligence which was sufficient foundation for the action.

Although, as above observed, we are not aware of an action having before been brought under the above circumstances, it is one which is altogether consistent with the course of the decisions upon the general law of principal and agent. These show that it is the latter's duty, in the absence of specific instructions, to pursue the accustomed course of that business in which he is employed, and it is clear that it is not the business of a house agent to let to an insolvent tenant. Again, it has been laid down that an agent is chargeable with all losses incurred by his own negligence, and this even, in some cases, where at first sight such a doctrine might seem to savour of hardship; as where he has been induced to part with his principal's property by the production of a forged authority (Forster v. Clements, 2 Camp. 17), a much stronger case than the present one. Here, indeed, he actually knew of the tenant's insolvency; but it is apprehended that he would also be liable if he accepted him without taking reasonable means to ascertain his respectability.

LAW EXAMINATIONS.—AVERAGE OF PLUCKING.

The results of the examinations of the Incorporated Law Society, held at different periods of the year, contrast in a remarkable manner. Taking much interest in the examinations, I have referred to the official statements, which show variations from as low as 4 per cent. to as high as 28 per cent. in the numbers of unsuccessful candidates; and, strange to say, the Hilary and Michaelmas examinations seem to be most fatal, whilst the Trinity is undoubtedly the most favourable, the number of postponements at the latter being generally very insignificant. As an illustration, at the last examination (Trinity), there were only 5 out of 125; but at Hilary, there were 28 out of 105. On comparing the results, for some years back, equally strange contrasts present themselves. Can any of your readers account for these phenomena?

Roscoe's Digest of the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases. 5th edition, with considerable additions. By DAVID POWER, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Counsel, Recorder of Ipswich. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons; H. Sweet; and W. Maxwell. 1861.

The Magisterial Formulist, being a complete Collection of Forms and Precedents for practical use in all Cases out of Quarter Sessions, and in Parochial Matters, by Magistrates, their Clerks, and Attorneys; with an Introduction, Explanatory Directions, Variations, and Notes. By GEORGE C. OKE, Assistant Clerk to the Lord Mayor of London, Author of "The Magisterial Synopsis," "The Laws of Turnpike Roads," &c., &c. 3rd edition, enlarged and revised. London: Butterworths. 1861.

Stone's Practice of Petty Sessions, with the Statutes, a List of Summary Convictions, and an Appendix of Forms. 7th edition. By THOMAS BELL, and LEWIS W. CAVE, of the Inner Temple, Esquires, Barristers-at-law. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons; H. Sweet; and W. Maxwell. 1861.

The publication within a few weeks of three works relating to the Criminal Law looks as if both law authors and publishers had more faith in the prognostications of Mr. Coode, than in the long announced consolidation of our criminal law, which was to have been certainly and effectually achieved by the series of Bills for that purpose now before Parliament. It is so many years since the first attempt at a criminal code, and so many and such earnest promises have been made, during the last six sessions, about its complete achievement, we are not surprised that people have little faith in what the present inert session will do in the way of consolidating our criminal law. Although the Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill has been read a third time in the House of Commons, and the Consolidation Bills have made some progress, it is not very likely that the Statute Book for 1861 will contain a criminal code, even such as that comprised in the Bills of the Statute Law Commissioners, and castigated by Mr. Coode in his letter to Lord Palmerston which we recently noticed. If, contrary to general expectation, however, these Consolidation Bills shall forthwith become law, we shall, of course, require some new text books adapted to the new statutes. But until then we can hardly have anything better as a text-book for practitioners in criminal courts than the last edition of Roscoe, in which all the modern cases relating to the subjects comprised in the work have been methodically and accurately noted up by Mr. David Power, the present editor, with the assistance of Mr. Markby of the Northern Circuit. Both of these gentlemen have had considerable experience as counsel practising in criminal courts, and have proved themselves well qualified for the task which they have undertaken. Roscoe has been so long recognised as the best and most convenient book upon the law of evidence in criminal cases, that we need say nothing further of the present edition than that it is the most complete which has yet appeared; and whatever Parliament may do with the Consolidation Bills now before it will have little effect to render this volume less useful, except by altering the references from the old incorporated Acts to the new code. Nearly all if not the entire of that part of the work which relates to evidence and modes of proof will remain untouched; and so will the definitions of crime, although, so far as they are to be found in Acts of Parliament, the places of which will be changed whenever the code comes into operation. So that, all all events, until that long promised event occurs, barristers and solicitors who take sessions business cannot well do without a late edition of Roscoe, and even afterwards, whatever unscientific or fanciful shape the code may assume, they cannot be far astray so long as they have their old guide to consult.

Mr. Oke, the assistant clerk to the Lord Mayor, is also well known as a writer on criminal law. The late Lord Chancellor referred with praise to the author of the Magisterial Synopsis, in which Mr. Oke gives, according to a tabular arrangement, an account of summary convictions and indictable offences, and of the procedure relating to them in a manner which is extremely convenient for reference. His "Formulist," as the term implies, is mainly a collection of forms and precedents, and being the compilation of a gentleman of very great experience and learning in such matters, has been found extremely useful as a companion volume to the synopsis. The two volumes together constitute a complete library for magistrates, and are indispensable for their clerks, and for attorneys practising before magistrates. The new edition of "The Formulist," is 364 pages larger than the previous one, and contains many useful additions of special forms which are not to be found elsewhere. The best recommendation of the book, however, is that two editions have been exhausted since 1850, when the first edition was published.

Stone's "Practice of Petty Sessions" has also gone through several editions, the present being the seventh. It is a small and unpretending volume; and in a great measure the present edition may be (as, indeed, it is confessed by its editor to be) a compilation from larger works on criminal law, and particularly Mr. Oke's "Synopsis," to which we have just referred. This little work, however, has been found a compendious manual for young practitioners and magistrates who do not care to be very learned in their office. It contains an appendix of the forms in common use, and may be taken as a reliable guide as far as it goes.

Obituary.

SIR JOHN PATTESON, KNT.

The decease of Lord Campbell has been soon followed by the death of another eminent judge, Sir John Patteson, who expired on the 28th ult., at his seat Feniton-court, near Honiton, Devonshire. He was born at Norwich in 1790, and was the second son of the Rev. Henry Patteson, of Drinkstone, Suffolk, by the daughter of Mr. Richard Ayton Lee, a banker in London. Sir John's paternal uncle, John Patteson, for some time represented the city of Norwich in Parliament. The deceased judge was educated at Eton, where he was a pupil of the present Primate. He was elected on the foundation, and succeeded to King's College, Cambridge, where he was the first that obtained the Davies' University scholarship. Besides a fellowship, he obtained in that university the degree of B.A. in 1813, and that of M.A. in 1816. He soon afterwards entered at the Middle Temple and became a pupil of Mr. Joseph afterwards Justice Littledale. Sir John commenced practice as a certificated special pleader, and soon acquired a very large practice, and had a great number of pupils, many of them being Irish students, and among whom was the Right Hon. Joseph Napier, late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who was greatly distinguished at the Irish bar as a pleader. The deceased judge was called to the bar in 1821, and soon rose to eminence on the Northern Circuit, which was then eminent both for its leaders and juniors. He had a very large junior business, and was often called upon to argue important cases at Westminster. At the close of his argument in the case of Reynell v. The Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. Justice Bayley handed him a note from the bench worded thus:—"Dear P., per Tenterden, C.J.—An admirable argument; shows him fit to be an early judge." He was much engaged in quo warranto cases, and on the Crown side of the Court of King's Bench; and he drew the pleadings, in the case of the Cato-street conspirators, against Thistlewood and his confederates. Time, however, did not admit of the full development of his forensic powers. In 1830 he was elevated, within the unusually short period of nine years from the date of his call, to a puisne judgeship in the Court of Queen's Bench, upon which occasion he received the honour of knighthood. Upon the adoption by Parliament of the report of the Common Law Commissioners, of whom Mr. Patteson was one, the Welch Judicature was abolished, and three new judgeships established to meet the consequent increase of business; thus altering the historic number of the common law judges from twelve to fifteen. Lord Lyndhurst selected Taunton, Alderson, and Patteson—the first and last to the Queen's Bench—Sir James Parke being translated from the latter court to the Court of Exchequer. Mr. Justice Patteson had not previously a silk gown; he had never led a cause or addressed a jury. Yet, owing to the urbanity of his manner, and the acknowledged goodness of his disposition, his promotion gave satisfaction to all.

He enjoyed the entire confidence of Lord Tenterden, notwithstanding the difference in standing and age between the Lord Chief Justice and him. With Lord Denman his intimacy was of the most cordial character. Lord Campbell likewise held the abilities of his senior puisse in the highest estimation, and both in public and private, was lavish of his encomiums on him.

Sir John was distinguished on the bench for lucid judgments, and deep and extensive knowledge of law, as also for good sense and courtesy. He had great breadth of view, and rare sagacity in applying the principles of law to the cases before him. This was the more important during the reign of special pleading, which was calculated to engender, both in the court and in the bar, an acute and critical habit of mind rather than broad or sound principles of judgment.

He had great urbanity of manner united to tenderness of disposition. This latter quality was doubtless the cause of his retirement. He became deaf, and was so tender of the interests committed to his charge that it caused him to withdraw even from the Judicial Committee, where there is little forensic bustle. His memory is associated with the most pleasing recollections, in the minds of all who knew him either in his judicial capacity or in private life. In 1852, on his departure from the Bench, Sir Alexander Cockburn, the then newly appointed Attorney-General, made a very touching speech, which was listened to with the entire sympathy of the bar. Sir John was very much moved, and expressed a hope that his deafness, or, as he supposed, his irritability, had not caused injustice in any case.

In the important and well-known case of Stockdale v. Hansard, which involved a conflict between the courts of law and the House of Commons, he concurred with his Court in their opinion of the paramount authority of courts of law. The case is commented on in the first volume of Smith's Leading Cases, under that of Ashby v. White, in which a similar struggle for superiority arose between the Lords and the Commons. Sir John, soon after his retirement from the bench, was made a member of the Privy Council, and was very constant in his attendance on appeals before the Judicial Committee. He was appointed, in 1853, a commissioner to inquire into the state of the Corporation of the City of London. He was also appointed to determine the limits of the jurisdiction of the Mayor and Corporation of Cambridge as against the University of Cambridge. Of late years, owing to increasing infirmities, he had entirely withdrawn himself from judicial duties. The cause of his death was a lingering and painful one—cancer of the throat.

Sir John was twice married; first to the third daughter of Mr. George Lee, of Dickleburgh, Norfolk; and secondly, to a daughter of Mr. James Coleridge, of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, and sister of Mr. Justice Coleridge. The deceased judge survived his second wife, and has left several children, one of whom was recently consecrated a missionary bishop to the islands of the South Pacific Ocean; and another was also, some short time since, appointed a revising barrister for one of the districts on the Northern Circuit. Since his retirement from judicial functions, Sir John Patteson resided wholly at his seat in Devonshire, where he dispensed a cordial hospitality, as well as a freely given advice and arbitration, to all who sought his aid. The deceased judge was a good type of the erudite and benevolent English gentleman, as well as of the clear, learned, and painstaking judge. Sir John paid a visit about six years ago to the members of the Northern Circuit at Liverpool, where he was most warmly received by all, his name having been a tradition upon that circuit for everything that was dignified and humane. His name will, doubtless, be long held in veneration.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

The following is the report of the committee of this Society to the annual meeting of its members, which was held on Tuesday last:—

Gentlemen—The committee, in presenting their annual report, have great pleasure in recording their unanimous opinion that the society was never in a more flourishing condition than at the present time, numbering more than a hundred members, of whom fully seventy attend the debates. The register book shows that ninety-two members have spoken on the various subjects during the last three months, and the average during the year is fully eight to each question, there being twenty-five present at each of the twenty-nine meetings that have been held; and when it is remembered that, on two occasions, no question was discussed, the time having been occupied in disposing of motions respecting alterations in the proceedings of the society, these and other statistics will be considered satisfactory. The debate has occupied nearly two hours and a half, and sixteen votes have been recorded each evening this quarter. Nineteen legal and ten jurisprudential questions have been discussed during the year, upon one of which there was an adjournment.

In consequence of long-continued absence and nonpayment of fines and subscriptions, the names of seven gentlemen have been erased from the list of members, and eight others have resigned from their having left town and other causes. A more than equivalent addition has, however, been made, as twenty-eight new members have been elected.

During the current year it was resolved: "That no member of this society, other than the opener of the debate, should in future be permitted to speak on any question for a longer period than twenty minutes. And also, that any member desirous of withdrawing from the society should send his resignation in writing to the secretary."

The abolition of the custom of members giving notice of absence for their friends does not appear to have been productive of any personal inconvenience, and is likely to produce regular attendance.

It gives us much pleasure to report that at each of the examinations, members of this society have obtained prizes, certificates of merit, or have been otherwise honourably distinguished.

Several changes have taken place in the committee of management since the last annual report. At the annual meeting Mr. Wingate was elected secretary in the room of Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Marchant, not desiring to be re-elected, Mr. Green was chosen in his place. Since then Mr. Miller resigned the office of treasurer, to which Mr. Lawrance was elected, the vacancy being thus caused in the committee was supplied by Mr. Bradford. Mr. Plaskitt and Mr. Matthews subsequently retiring, were replaced by Mr. Dowse and Mr. Hills.

Mr. Jackson has also been elected an auditor, in conjunction with Mr. Richard.

Your committee have given their careful consideration to upwards of forty legal questions proposed for discussion, and have been enabled to approve of twenty-three, all of which have appeared in the papers, as well as some very interesting ones of a jurisprudential character, which have afforded a constant succession of new and varied subjects of the highest order, upon which much difference of opinion has been well expressed. And in consequence of the great diversity of authorities to be found on each of the legal questions, very able arguments have been adduced, and narrow majorities invariably obtained, as appears from the president's book. We desire to render our best thanks to those members who have afforded us assistance by proposing questions for discussion, and at the same time to remind you of the absolute necessity there is that great diligence should at all times be shown in this respect, particularly during the coming vacation.

The committee, however, feel compelled to call attention to the fact that many members have habitually omitted this necessary duty, thereby putting the committee to great inconvenience.

The society has been in existence for a quarter of a century, having completed its twenty-fifth year in the month of May last. Your committee cannot help thinking that this fact calls for special notice at their hands, and that it is a subject of congratulation that the society has been gradually increasing in strength and influence from year to year since its formation; and they feel sure that, as its advantages become better known and appreciated by the younger members of the profession, its influence will become more widespread, and that it will, at no distant period, be recognised by the profession at large as an institution which deserves their support, for the energy which it displays in endeavouring to stimulate the abilities and cultivate the debating powers of all who enrol themselves in its ranks, and who by its means acquire one of the many attributes which at the present day are needed to ensure success in the profession of the law.

Our example has, we have every reason to believe, been extensively followed by the formation of similar societies in most of the large provincial towns, and we take this opportunity of suggesting that great advantage would accrue if general intercommunication could be established.

Your committee have had their attention directed to a letter which appeared in the Solicitors' Journal in April last, and in which the writer complained of the arbitrary and exclusive nature of sec. 2, of rule 1, which restricts the right of admission to the society to such persons as are either subscribers to the library or lectures of the Incorporated Law Society, or are clerks articulated to members of that society, or who, having been articulated, are in the service of members of that society. It was urged that by such restriction the usefulness of the society was lessened, and there was no reason why the doors of the society should not be open to every articulated clerk who wished to avail himself of its privileges. To this letter the treasurer replied that, while it was far from the intention of the society to limit its sphere of action or narrow its usefulness, yet that, in deference to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, to whom it owes many advantages, it could not break faith with the council by a relaxation of the rule in question, inasmuch as these advantages were especially intended to be conferred upon those persons who were, in some way or another, connected with the Incorporated Law Society, an institution which affords valuable assistance to students for methodising and extending their legal knowledge by the use of an extensive library and attendance at the lectures delivered under its auspices.

The committee hope and believe that in arriving at this conclusion, not only were the best interests of the society consulted, but also that the treasurer acted in accordance with the wishes and instructions of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, who have always shown this society much liberality and consideration.

The treasurer's report of the receipts and payments for the year has been audited, and shows a balance in favour of the society.

In conclusion, your committee beg to impress upon students the importance of early acquiring the art of giving expression to their thoughts with self-possession and perspicuity; this can only be acquired by practice, and no better means will be found than a constant attendance at the debates of this society.—We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Deputations from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and the Manchester, Birmingham, and Lincoln Law Societies, have had an interview with Sir Cresswell Cresswell, on the subject of the General Order issued a short time since, respecting the business to be transacted by the Registrars of the District Courts of Probate. In the course of the interview his Lordship intimated that any proposal for an alteration in the Order must receive the previous sanction of the Lords of the Treasury, their Lordships having on the faith of the new Order made their arrangements respecting the salaries of the District Registrars.

In consequence of the above suggestion of Sir Cresswell Cresswell, the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association has forwarded to the Lords of the Treasury a memorial, of which the following is a copy.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury.

The humble memorial of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association,

Sheweth,—

That the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association is composed of nearly 800 practising attorneys and solicitors in England and Wales.

That by recent orders of your lordships and of the judge of the Probate Court, the district registrars of such Court are required to prepare for personal applicants the necessary affidavits and evidences in support of their applications for probates and letters of administration, at a lower scale of fees to be taken for the use of the Government, than that prescribed to be taken by solicitors for their own use.

That Government has thus commenced to compete with solicitors for a portion of their professional employment, by offering to perform, by means of salaried officials, professional business for less than professional fees.

That the result of this competition is likely to be to attract to the Government officials the whole of the non-contentious business of the Court, which is vastly more in amount and importance than the contentious business.

That for the Government to enter upon such a competition would be harsh and oppressive towards any profession or calling, and is especially so towards a profession which is highly and exceptionally taxed, and which in respect of such excessive taxation is entitled to receive from Government protection against all invasion of its legitimate professional functions; and yet it is believed that it is the only profession or calling with which the Government has as yet sought to compete in the acquisition and transaction of business.

That your memorialists view with great alarm the introduction of a system which, if extended, may work great injustice and hardship on the legal, and also on other professions and callings, and may very much encroach upon the independent action and freedom from officialism which have hitherto happily prevailed in this country.

That this invasion of the practice of solicitors is a breach of the understanding, upon which, on the passing of the Probate Act, on the one hand, the whole body of proctors were at once admitted as solicitors; whilst, as an equivalent on the other, the business previously transacted by proctors, of which the non-contentious is the more valuable portion, was thrown open to solicitors.

That if the Government should still think it right to transact the business in question, it would be but just that it should do so only at the same scale of fees as are thought to be a fair remuneration to solicitors.

That it is not advantageous to the community that facilities and encouragement should be offered to personal applications for the grants of probates and letters of administration, inasmuch as the registrars cannot, in most cases, know anything of the applicants personally, nor have any means of protection against fraud and forgery, whilst a solicitor must in every case know something, at least, of the applicants, and generally all the peculiar circumstances upon which a judgment could be formed as to the propriety of granting or refusing the application. It is quite compatible with the system of permitting personal application that probates of forged wills and grants of letters of administration to living persons may be obtained, and that without difficulty, and the funded and other personal property of the supposed deceased be realised and the fraudulent parties have absconded with the proceeds before the owner could be aware of the transaction. The registrar can have no means of judging whether the will produced is a genuine or a forged one, whether the supposed deceased be really living or dead, whether there be or not a subsequent will to that propounded, nor whether the testator was sane or insane or under undue influence; whilst, on the contrary, the solicitor, who is responsible as an officer of the court, feels it to be his duty to inquire into all these circumstances.

That in the Manchester district registry a case has already recently happened—viz. that of Ann Dean, in which, upon personal application to the registrar, probate of a forged will has been obtained; and the present system offers every facility for the repetition of such an imposition.

That to permit the same official, who is constituted the arbiter and judge of the sufficiency of the evidence which may be brought before him to entitle the applicant to grant of probate or administration, to be the preparer and getter up of such evidence, is inconsistent with all known systems of jurisprudence in this country, and with all correct principle, and a dangerous innovation in itself, and the duties which the registrars now have to perform under it are inconsistent and conflicting.

Your memorialists therefore humbly pray that your lordships will take such measures in concert with the judge of the Probate Court, as will prohibit the registrars from preparing or being in any wise concerned in preparing the evidence in support of applications for grants of probate or administration; and that in the meantime, your lordships will be pleased to direct that the fees to be taken by them for so doing shall be the same as those which are now prescribed to be taken by solicitors.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Signed on behalf of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association,

J. S. TORR, Chairman.

PHILIP RICKMAN, Secretary.

It will be seen that the statements in this memorial are substantially to the same effect as those addressed to the judge ordinary, which were contained in our impression of last week. It is obviously desirable that all the provincial law societies, and where there are none, that local solicitors, should address themselves to the Lords of the Treasury in support of the movement for the abrogation of the new order. It will not be necessary to do more than memorialise in general terms against the obnoxious innovation; as abundant argument upon the question has already been adduced, and all that is wanted is to show that the grievance complained of is generally felt and resented. But the attention of the authorities should be called to any particular cases, like that which has happened in the Manchester District, showing the actual injury which arises from the employment of district registrars as the private solicitors of parties applying for probate or administration. It is to be observed that the recent general order does not apply to London. At the same time, London solicitors have a deep interest in the question, as the intention was, no doubt, to introduce the same practice in the metropolis after it had been tried in the provinces.

Several petitions from provincial law societies in favour of the Government concentration of courts scheme have been presented to both Houses of Parliament during the week; and there can be no doubt that the great body of solicitors, not only in London but throughout the provinces, feel a deep interest in the passing of the two Bills now before Parliament for providing a site and funds for the new building. But there appears to be little hope at this late period of the session that these Bills will be passed into law, although undoubtedly the Government is sincere in its efforts to push them forward. The real obstacle is the vis inertiae of Parliament, and not any particular opposition which the measure has had to encounter. The reasons for and against it have been so long and fully discussed that the question of concentration, and also of the site for the new palace of justice, may be considered as definitively settled not only by the report of the commissioners, which is conclusive in point of argument, but also by the common consent of all intelligent persons whose judgments are not affected by personal or special considerations. Neither does there seem to be any serious difficulty about the proposed application of the Chancery fee funds, for the purpose of providing the requisite buildings. Yet there now appears to be almost a certainty of the postponement for at least another session of this important and well considered measure. The Joint Stock Companies Bill, the Highways Bill, the County Courts Consolidation Bill, the Artistic Copyright Bill, the Domicile Bills, and the Copyright of Designs Bill, are not unlikely to share the same fate, although some of them have made considerable progress. What is to become of the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills is still extremely uncertain, as their further progress in the House of Lords is delayed by the stoppage in the House of Commons of the Offences against the Person Bill, which is one of the batch, and has not yet been considered by the lower House. The Trade Marks Bill was sent up to the House of Lords some weeks ago, since which time it appears to have slept. We have heard nothing for some time of the Statute Law Revision Bill, but it will probably receive the sanction of Parliament before the conclusion of the session. The Bankruptcy Bill is still in a very uncertain position: but as Lord Palmerston has named so early a day as Monday for the Government to state its intentions with reference to the Lords Amendments to the Bill, it would seem that Ministers are anxious that they should boast of the enactment of this Bill, at least, as the fruit of the present session.

Some months ago we took occasion to call the attention of the benchers of Gray's-inn to the scandalous revelations respecting two members of that society which were made in a trial in which one of them was a plaintiff, and the other a defendant; and we called upon the benchers to vindicate the character of their ancient and honourable Society, by immediately instituting inquiries into the matters which had been disclosed, so far as they affected the character of the persons in question. We believe that in doing this, we merely gave expression to the feeling of the general body of the profession, who are certainly interested in the good name of its members, and especially of those who, from their position as advocates, may be considered in a great measure to represent the whole body in the eye of the public. We are sorry to say, however, that notwithstanding this appeal to the benchers of Gray's-inn, they have taken no step to set themselves or the profession right with the public in respect of the subject of our complaint. It has been privately rumoured, indeed, that some investigation has actually taken place; but what the result of it has been, is a secret. Whether the person who, according to the evidence upon the trial, pursued the double avocation of law student and bill-discounter, is still a probationer from the dignity of barrister-at-law, or has been expunged from the roll of his inn of court, is a matter upon which we can satisfy ourselves only by making private inquiries for that purpose. It is said that the benchers of Gray's-inn did, in fact, attempt a rigid investigation into the conduct of the parties in question; but as to how far it was carried, or in what it resulted, not only the general public and the legal profession, but even the members of the inns of court remain in complete ignorance. The subject of the jurisdiction of the Inns of Court over their members has been recently revived in a manner which commands attention. The great secrecy with which certain proceedings affecting the professional position of at least one prominent member of the Common Law Bar has not prevented any person who feels the slightest interest in the subject from gaining no little information, more or less exact, about the nature of the issues raised in these investigations, the charges which have been made, and the evidence which has been adduced in support of them. But the decisions (if any) which have been arrived at by these anomalous tribunals are, as might have been expected, reported very variously; although assuming the jurisdiction to be competent and the rumours relating to the charges and evidence to be well founded, it is not easy to conceive how there can be much difficulty in arriving at a just and satisfactory conclusion. There is no denying the fact, however, that while solicitors are continually exposed to have their conduct canvassed in the public courts and animadverted upon with severity not only by censorious judges, but by advocates, some of whom have the slenderest pretensions to assume the guardianship of public morals, it is by no means impossible for members of the Bar to pursue for many years an unimpeached and successful course of practice, while it is matter of common notoriety that they have rendered themselves obnoxious to imputations which, so long as they remain unexplained, ought to be sufficient to place them outside the pale of respectable society. Yet so strangely inert are the governing bodies of the higher branch of the profession that nothing short of the greatest public scandal appears to have the least effect in putting them in motion against wrong-doers. This is no doubt partly owing to the jealousy in favour of personal independence which exists among all bodies of Englishmen; but in the case of the Bar it is to be attributed much more to the exceptional and inefficient character of the self-constituted tribunals for the determination of questions affecting the honour of its members, and also to the mysterious secrecy with which such proceedings are conducted. The time seems to have come, however, for the Bar to contrive some more active and efficient means than it now possesses for this purpose.

A Bill for amending the Laws relating to Attorneys and Solicitors in Ireland has passed through committee in the House of Commons. It contains provisions analogous to some of those relating to the admission of candidates which were enacted in the English Act of last session. It provides that persons who have taken degrees in Arts, or in the Faculty of Laws, at any of the universities in England or Ireland, or members of the Bar, may be admitted after three years' service. There is also a clause similar to the "ten years clerks' clause" in the English Act, and another which provides that no articulated clerk—or "apprentice," as the term is used in Ireland—who has been a barrister, or a "ten years clerk" (in the latter case, where he has served at least two years in a Dublin office), shall be required to attend lectures or keep terms in Dublin during his apprenticeship.

It is said that already applications for silk gowns have been made to the present Lord Chancellor by some of the leading juniors of the Chancery bar; but that his lordship has notified that it is not his intention at present to increase the number of her Majesty's Counsel. It is not unlikely, however, that on account of the prominent position and large business of the gentlemen who are said to have applied for promotion, that their names will be included in the next list of Queen's Counsel. We have not heard that any applications from the common law bar have yet been made.

LAWYERS FOR CORONERS.

Our attention has been called to a vigorous contest which is now going on for the coronership of the south-eastern division of Somersetshire. The vacancy has been caused by the death of Mr. Ashford, a solicitor, who was the last coroner for the division; and there are now several candidates in the field. The fight really lies between two of them—Mr. Watts, a solicitor, of Yeovil, and Mr. Wybrants, a medical practitioner, residing at Shepton Mallett. It is not our habit to interfere in such contests, or in the management of local affairs, except so far as they may involve topics of professional interest; and if, in the present case, the question merely affected the personal character, or the interests of the candidates, we should abstain from touching it. But the last number of the Lancet newspaper, in a short article enforcing the claim of Mr. Wybrants, appeals in his favour for the strenuous support of the medical practitioners of that division; and we therefore consider ourselves bound, as the organ of solicitors throughout the country, to offer some observations upon the duties and requirements of the office of coroner, with a view of showing that the pretensions which the Lancet suggests on behalf of the medical body over those of lawyers, are altogether unfounded.

The office of coroner is one of the most ancient of our institutions, and any freeholder having land in the county "sufficient to answer all people," is capable of being elected, unless he be a common trader, or occupied in some business which is incompatible with the duties of such office. There is no doubt, therefore, that the freeholders may elect a medical practitioner, or almost any other respectable man residing in the district, who does not lie under some special incapacity. We do not attempt to deny the perfect right of medical men to offer themselves, and if possible to obtain their election, for the office of coroner. What we say is, that their professional avocations and experience do not render them so fit as practising lawyers to discharge the duties of the office. These duties are partly ministerial and partly judicial. Some of them, however, and especially those of the former character, are fast becoming historical, and have little occasion or interest in the present day. We do not now often hear of inquisitions of treasure trove, of wrecks of the sea, or of sturgeons or whales; yet the ministerial functions of a coroner are not, at least in theory, entirely obsolete. The coroner may any day be called upon, in case of disability on the part of the sheriff, to execute the Queen's writs; and it appears, also, that he may sometimes have to pronounce judgment of outlawry. We admit that these duties are of little practical importance compared with those that belong to the judicial part of the office, by which he is required to hold inquests on the bodies of persons dying by violence, or in cases of sudden death under circumstances of suspicion, and to prepare and make return of his inquisitions, as well as to apprehend persons charged with murder or manslaughter, and to bind over according to law prosecutors and witnesses. At first sight, and also, we think, after the best consideration, an unprejudiced person can hardly fail to be struck with the important character of these judicial duties. A coroner's inquest is frequently a preliminary trial for murder. The evidence there adduced affects not only the verdict to be given on that occasion, but indirectly—by the impressions which it makes on the public mind—the verdict of the jury upon the arraignment, and the ultimate fate of the person charged. It is, therefore, but common justice to the parties whose reputations and lives are liable to be thus put in jeopardy, that the judge presiding in the coroner's court should at least have some acquaintance with the rules of evidence, and with the proceedings of courts of justice; and it is hardly necessary to insist that we cannot expect this from men whose lives are devoted to the study and practice of medicine.

The accused, moreover, are not the only persons interested in securing for our coronerships competent judicial officers. The public have a deeper interest in this matter. An inquest is one of our most constitutional, and ought to be the most effective, of all the agencies for the detection of crime which exist in this country. We have not, as some continental countries have, a ramified system of officialism for inquiring into cases of death under suspicious circumstances, nor have we, as they have in Scotland, a number of procurators-fiscal, whose duty is to institute secret and ex parte inquiries into such cases. Our only direct agency is the coroner's inquest; and upon that the public is obliged to rely for the discovery of guilt as well as for the protection of innocence. An ignorant or inapt person presiding in this court, may, by his unskillfulness, not only unintentionally cause the escape of the guilty, but the accusation of the innocent. Indeed, in this respect, unless we are to have competent lawyers for our coroners, common justice suggests a preference for the Scotch system of secret inquiry. At all events it requires hardly more than a mere statement of the duties of the coronership to be convinced that they ought not to be assumed by persons who are untrained in judicial business, and in the law of evidence. A medical practitioner might, no doubt, be expected upon a view of the corpse to account for the death more satisfactorily than a person who had no acquaintance with the practice of physic. But in every such case the doctor's opinion should be given as matter of evidence and not as a judicial dictum. It is for the jury to decide what weight it will give to the medical testimony when considered in the light of all the other evidence; and it is manifestly undesirable that the person whose duty it is to act as a judge should be exposed to the temptation of maintaining any pet hypotheses of his own which may have the effect of coercing the decision of the jury, who are the only constitutional judges of the facts.

It ought not to be forgotten that in another division of the county of Somerset, there recently occurred a memorable instance illustrating the importance to the public interests of having in every coroner a person competent to conduct, after something like a judicial manner, an inquiry into cases of death under suspicious circumstances. In the famous Road Murder Case the coroner, if we mistake not, was a medical practitioner, who of course cannot be supposed to have had much experience in the conduct of cases involving voluminous and complicated evidence. It is no wonder then that the inquest over which he presided, in that remarkable case, and the mode in which it was conducted generally, should have given rise to great dissatisfaction throughout the country. Indeed, it would have been a marvel if the fact were otherwise. But the country will have made little use of the important lesson which it received in the Road Case, if in future more care than hitherto is not shewn, by the selection, for the office of coroner of persons competent to discharge judicial functions and acquainted with the procedure of Courts of Justice.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. VI.

Of the Nature and Classification of Trade Marks.

I have thought it more convenient to defer the consideration and definition of the nature of a trade-mark, until I had discussed the general principles on which it has been protected, because the word itself gave a very good notion of what sort of cases we should have to consider. There are, however, distinct from what may be looked on as trade-marks proper, two species of property which have been protected in the Court of Equity on principles analogous to those on which the decisions in the former class of cases rest: these are the good-will of a trade so far as it is contained in the style and title of a partnership, or the name of a trader, or the description of his place of business; and property in a name or distinguishing style, as connected with a literary publication or a work of art.

These two classes of cases it is my intention to consider before taking a survey in order of time of those relating to trade-marks properly so called; they are branches, and of some importance too, of the same subject, and as such, the principles which we find laid down in them are most valuable in leading us to those which support the decisions on the main head. There is another class of cases too which must not be entirely omitted from consideration, I mean those in which the interference of the Court has been grounded on the general doctrine of the prevention of damage arising from a breach of trust or confidence.

By this method of classification I hope to be able to include most of those cases which remain to be considered, under some general head. It seems to me, however, that there would be much convenience in having a statutory definition of a trade-mark, which should distinguish, as is done by the French law, between the different classes of cases—between the marques de fabriques or trade-marks properly so called, consisting of a stamp affixed to or incorporated with a manufactured article, and the use of a name, or label, or a sign-board, or placard, and all those less permanent marks of distinction which are in use in trade; and again separating from them all cases which involve literary or industrial property.

In Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, the nature of a good-will in a trade, and the extent to which it is protected, are fully illustrated. The good-will in that case consisted in certain premises in Bath and in Bristol, which were sold by the assignees in bankruptcy of one of the defendants, Edward Lye, who had for some years, together with his father, George Lye, carried on the business of a carrier from Bristol through Bath to London; the same parties having also a carrying business from Bristol through Salisbury and Warminster to London. At the sale, the whole of the premises of the Messrs. Lye, and their business as carriers from Bristol through Bath to London, and the good-will of that business, was sold in one lot to the plaintiffs; the carrying business from Bristol through Warminster and Salisbury being put up for sale separately, and eventually bought by friends of E. Lye, the defendant, who then set him up in that business. The question was, whether the defendant, according to the facts stated, was really carrying on his own trade and not the plaintiff's. There is no doubt that a person having sold a house and stock-in-trade is, in the absence of any special covenant, at liberty to set up a similar business, if he pleases, next door to his former shop,—that is merely a fair case of competition in trade; but he must not, under colour of chalking out a different course of trading, really carry on, for his own benefit, the trade of others. The good-will in this case was defined to be nothing more than the probability that the old customers would resort to the old place of business, and if that species of property was damaged by the fraudulent act of the defendant, that would give a right to relief; but it was considered by Lord Eldon that the facts were not sufficient to prove such a fraudulent design; he says that they "amount to no more than that the defendant asserts a right to set up this trade (the carrying business) and has set it up as the like but not the same trade with that sold, taking only those means that he had a right to take to improve it." The case of Keen v. Harris was also commented on and distinguished from the present, on the ground that there an injunction was granted to relieve against a breach of trust. In that case, the printer of the Bath Chronicle left to his widow the benefit of that newspaper, subject to a trust for bringing up her family; she formed an attachment for the foreman of the business, and allowed him the use of the old house and types to set up a rival paper under the same name.

The case of Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 421, goes further to illustrate the same notion of property in a partnership's name, as a species of goodwill, attached, not to the place of business, but to the name of a firm or of the trader. Accordingly, it was held by the Vice-Chancellor, that a surviving partner had, on the death of his co-partner, a right to carry on the business under the designation of the original firm; that the goodwill arising from the use of a particular designation was, during the partnership, the joint property of the partners, and became, on the death of one of them, the sole property of the survivor. His Honour, however, while granting the injunction, at the same time directed the plaintiff to bring his action-at-law.

Thus far we have been considering the general goodwill in trade appendant to a place or a person; but it seems to me that the advantage gained in the market by the use of a trade-mark is only a sort of special goodwill, having the same qualities as property, and entitled to the same species of protection. There is, perhaps, one distinction to be fairly drawn between the two classes of cases; that whereas in the latter we may have, as in Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, the adoption of a trade-mark by unauthorised persons, without any intention to commit fraud, and still have such an adoption restrained in equity, it is difficult to conceive a case coming under the former head in which the goodwill, either personal or local, of a trader, could be otherwise than fraudulently impeached (supposing the title to it to be clear); and therefore it might seem that in such cases the jurisdiction is founded on fraud only. That, however, does not seem to be the ground upon which the Vice-Chancellor decided in Lewis v. Langdon (vide sup.), and I think that we may fairly look upon the goodwill in trade as a species of property, of a like nature with the quasi-property in a trade-mark.

There is another class of cases which appears to me to form the connecting link between those where a goodwill in trade has been protected, and the cases which I would venture to call those of trade marks proper. Those are when the advantages in the market (or goodwill) is due either to the name of the trader or trading firm, or to their place of business, or to both these causes combined, but not being as a goodwill allowed to rest merely in nubibus, is embodied in a label or wrapper and affixed to the article sold; this name is then called a trade-mark. Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, is a very important case under this head. The trade-mark there consisted in the name of Day & Martin, and their address 97, High Holborn, with other devices on a printed label attached to the bottles of blacking made by the plaintiffs, the executors of the former firm of Day & Martin, and then carrying on the same business; this was so closely imitated by the defendant as to afford the fair presumption that he intended the public to be deceived into buying his blacking as and for that of the original firm. In his judgment in this case the Master of the Rolls observes that the act complained of was equivalent to a sale by the defendant of his goods as those of the plaintiffs; that two things were requisite for the accomplishment of this fraud. First, a general resemblance of the forms, words, symbols, and accompaniments, such as to mislead the public. And, secondly, a sufficient distinctive individuality was to be preserved, so as to procure for the person himself the benefit of that deception, which the general resemblance was calculated to produce. In Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G., it was held, on grounds which I shall examine hereafter, that no fraud was intended; that it was always a question of evidence as to the false representation, and that it was incumbent on the party applying for an injunction that there was such a sale of the defendant's goods by him as to induce the public to conclude that these were those of the plaintiff. So, also, the cases of Burgess v. Hills, 20 Beav. 244, and Burgess v. Hatley, Id. 249. What we see done in all these cases is, in short, that a trader, perceives that an article manufactured by a particular house of business and known in the market by a particular stamp or design is sought after and has acquired a peculiar value; this advantage in the market he endeavours to appropriate to himself by offering for sale a similar article, recommended to the purchaser by a like distinctive mark; what is this in fact but an attempt to appropriate the goodwill of his rival? The term goodwill is, however, applied to the general result arising from the use in trade of that which, when applied or annexed to a single article, is called a trade-mark.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR.)

July 6.—Dickason v. Foster.—In this case, which was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chancellor, in dismissing the appeal with costs, observed that unless in very exceptional cases he was of opinion that costs ought to follow the event; and also stated that he thought the discretion vested in the Court had in some instances been exercised injudiciously.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—SECOND COURT.

July 6.—In a case sent over from the other court for the purpose of taking a verdict by consent, some argument took place on the propriety of allowing the costs of a special jury. The plea was one almost imputing fraud, and it was urged that a similar plea was pleaded every day.

Mr. Justice WILLES.—All I can say is, that whenever I try a cause in which such a plea is pleaded without good reason, I shall always certify for a special jury against the defendant.

The plaintiff's counsel said, "It would be well that your Lordship's intimation should go forth to the world."

SUMMER ASSIZES.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK.

July 9.—Mr. Baron WILDE opened the commission in this city to-day. It was stated that the cause list would be very heavy when made up, 21 special juries having been applied for.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—OXFORD.

July 10.—Mr. Justice HILL and Mr. Justice KEATING opened the commission in this city to-day. The cause list contained eight causes, one being marked for a special jury.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.—AYLESBURY.

July 11.—Mr. Justice ERLE opened the commission in this borough this morning. There were only three causes entered for trial.

THE NEW SOLICITOR-GENERAL.—Mr. Roundell Palmer is the second son of the late Rev. William Jocelyn Palmer, Rector of Mixbury, in Oxfordshire, by the youngest daughter of the late Rev. William Roundell, of Gladstone-house, in the county of York, and grandson of the late Mr. William Parker, of Nazing-park, in the county of Essex, and thus nephew of the late Mr. George Palmer, M.P. for South Essex, and also of the late Mr. John Horsley Palmer and of Sir Ralph Palmer, and cousin to Sir George Palmer, of Wanlip-hall, Leicestershire. Mr. Roundell Palmer was born in 1812, and married in 1848 the Lady Laura Waldegrave, second daughter of William, eighth Earl Waldegrave, by whom he has several children.

A vacancy has occurred in the office of deputy-keeper of her Majesty's records, by the death on Saturday last, at an advanced age, of Sir Peter Francis Palgrave.

It is stated that Sir Frederick Slade, Q.C., will be brought forward to contest the election of the Eastern Division of the county of Somerset, on the retirement of Sir W. Miles.

CONCENTRATION OF COURTS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition in favour of the concentration of the Courts.

TRANSFER OF STOCKS AND ANNUITIES BILL.

This Bill went through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, July 9.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed on Monday next with the consideration of the Lords' amendments in this Bill.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL replied he believed it was, but he was not positive.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE.

The following votes were agreed to:—

£32,395 for law charges, salaries, &c., including prosecutions relating to coin in the department of the Solicitor to the Treasury.

A sum to complete £167,000 for criminal prosecutions at assizes and quarter sessions.

A sum to complete £10,950 for the salaries and expenses of the Registrar and Marshal of the Court of Admiralty.

£6,176 for the salaries of the commissioners and other officers and the expenses of the Insolvent Debtors' Court.

£71,980 for the salaries of the registrars and officers and for the expenses of the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

A sum to complete £200,320 for the salaries and expenses of the county courts.

£3,342 for the salaries of the Lord-Advocate and Solicitor-General of Scotland.

£18,213 for the salaries and expenses of the officers of the Court of Session in Scotland.

£11,071 for salaries and expenses connected with the Court of Justiciary in Scotland.

£4,000 for criminal prosecutions under the authority of the Lord-Advocate.

£1,620 for the salaries and expenses of the legal branch of the Exchequer in Scotland.

£25,000 for the charges of the several sheriffs and stewards in Scotland, &c., who are not paid by salaries.

£18,935 for the salaries of such of the procurators fiscal as are not remunerated by fees.

CONSOLIDATION BILLS.—THE BANKRUPTCY, &c., BILL.

In answer to a question put by Mr. HADFIELD, The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the Offences against the Person Bill stood second in the orders of the day for Monday next, and it was proposed to report progress in supply between 11 and 12 o'clock, to give an opportunity of discussing the only clause in the Bill that remained to be considered. It was most important that no delay should take place, inasmuch as the further progress of the other Consolidation Bills in the other House was delayed, in consequence of this Bill not being sent forward. It was the intention of the Government to bring on the discussion of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill on Thursday next.

SALMON AND TROUT FISHERIES.

The House went into committee on this Bill, and after a short discussion on some of them, the clauses were agreed to and the House resumed.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Q.C., took the oaths and his seat on his election for the borough of Richmond, and was warmly congratulated by many of the members. The hon. and learned gentleman was introduced by Mr. Crawford and Mr. Brand.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

The following Bill was introduced by the late Attorney-General, the present Lord Chancellor, and differs in some important respect from that introduced into the House of Lords by Lord St. Leonards, and which is also now in the House of Commons waiting for the second reading.

A BILL TO AMEND THE LAW IN RELATION TO THE WILLS AND DOMICILE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS DYING WHILST RESIDENT ABROAD, AND OF FOREIGN SUBJECTS DYING WHILST RESIDENT WITHIN HER MAJESTY'S DOMINIONS.

Whereas by reason of the present law of domicile the wills of British subjects dying whilst resident abroad are often defeated, and their personal property administered in a manner contrary to their expectations and belief; and it is desirable to amend such law, but the same cannot be effectually done without the consent and concurrence of foreign states: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, as follows:

1. Whenever her Majesty shall by convention with any foreign state agree that provisions to the effect of the enactments herein contained shall be applicable to the subjects of her Majesty and of such foreign state respectively, it shall be lawful for her Majesty by any order in council to direct and it is hereby enacted, that from and after the publication of such order in the London Gazette no British subject resident at the time of his or her death in the foreign country named in such order shall be deemed under any circumstances to have acquired a domicile in such country unless such British subject shall have been permanently resident in such country for one year immediately preceding his or her decease, and shall also have made and deposited in a public office of such foreign country (such office to be named in order in council) a declaration in writing of his or her intention to become domiciled in such foreign country, and every British subject dying resident in such foreign country, but without having so resided and made such declaration as aforesaid, shall be deemed for all purposes of testate or intestate succession as to moveables, to retain the domicile he or she possessed at the time of his or her going to reside in such foreign country as aforesaid.

2. After any such convention as aforesaid shall have been entered into by her Majesty with any foreign state, it shall be lawful for her Majesty by order in council to direct, and from and after the publication of such order in the London Gazette it shall be and is hereby enacted, that no subject of any such foreign country who at the time of his or her death shall be resident in any part of Great Britain or Ireland shall be deemed under any circumstances to have acquired a domicile therein, unless such foreign subject shall have been resident within Great Britain or Ireland for one year immediately preceding his or her decease, and shall also have signed, and deposited with her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, a declaration in writing of his or her desire to become and be domiciled in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and that the law of the place of such domicile shall regulate his or her moveable succession.

3. This Act shall not apply to any foreigners who may have obtained letters of naturalization in any part of her Majesty's dominions.

4. Whenever a convention shall be made between her Majesty and any foreign state, whereby her Majesty's consuls or vice-consuls in such foreign state shall receive the same or the like powers and authorities as are herein-after expressed, it shall be lawful for her Majesty by order in council to direct, and from and after the publication of such order in the London Gazette it shall be and is hereby enacted, that whenever any subject of such foreign state shall die within the dominions of her Majesty, and there shall be no person present at the time of such death who shall be rightfully entitled to administer to the estate of such deceased person, it shall be lawful for the consul, vice-consul, or consular agent of such foreign state within that part of her Majesty's dominions where such foreign subject shall die, to take possession and have the custody of the personal property of the deceased, and to apply the same in payment of his or her debts and funeral expenses, and to retain the surplus for the benefit of the persons entitled thereto; but such consul, vice-consul, or consular agent shall immediately apply for and shall be entitled to obtain from the proper court letters of administration of the effects of such deceased person, limited in such manner and for such time as to such court shall seem fit.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

Benham v. Keane, V. C. W., 9 W. R., 765.

This case decides a point of considerable importance as to priority of incumbrances upon land in Middlesex. A. had entered up judgment, and, on the passing of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, in 1838, he registered it in the Common Pleas. He duly re-registered it within successive periods of five years, but it was not registered in Middlesex until 1857. In 1846 B. entered up judgment and registered it in the Common Pleas and in Middlesex; but it was not re-registered in the Common Pleas until 1858. The first question which arose was whether, supposing B. gained priority by being the first to register in Middlesex, he lost that priority by omitting to re-register in the Common Pleas. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 11, s. 4, it is enacted that all judgments registered under the provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, shall, after five years from the date of entry, be void against lands, &c., as to creditors, unless a memorandum be again left at the Common Pleas Office within five years before the right of such creditors accrued. It was decided in Beavan v. Lord Oxford (6 D. M. & G. 492; s. c. 4 W. R. 112), that the effect of this provision is to deprive the judgment creditor who omits to re-register within five years of protection against subsequent creditors, but not to alter his position as to previous creditors. It followed from this that B.'s right against A. was not affected by his omission to re-register in the Common Pleas. The next and more difficult question was whether A. by his prior registration in the Common Pleas obtained such an interest in the property as could not be divested by B.'s prior registration in Middlesex, having regard to the allegation that B. had notice of A.'s judgment. It was attempted in argument to place B.'s judgment upon the same footing as if he had been a purchaser who had contracted with the debtor to buy the land. But Vice-Chancellor Wood held that the position of the judgment creditor was not intended to be varied by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, to the extent of turning a judgment, which was a proceeding in iudicio, into a contract. "The conscience of the debtor was not affected in the same way as if he had contracted to sell; but rather the creditor got as good a charge as if he had contracted to purchase." Reference was made by his Honour, in illustration of this view, to the case of Beavan v. Lord Oxford, in its second stage (6 D. M. & G. 507; s. c. 4 W. R. 275), where it was decided that a judgment creditor is not a purchaser within the meaning of the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, and further, that the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, does not confer on the judgment creditor any right against a person claiming under a voluntary settlement previously made by the judgment debtor. It is, perhaps, rather difficult to trace the course of the argument of counsel which we have taken up. The object of it was to prepare the way for the application of the Middlesex Registry Act to the circumstances of the case. The question is, for the present, to be looked at irrespective of registration in the Common Pleas. The point to be considered is, whether B. could hold the interest which he had acquired in the land in the face of his having notice of the prior interest of A. It seems to have been the object of A.'s counsel, if we may so say, to elevate A. and to depress B. into the position, respectively, of purchasers. It was sought to establish that A.'s right was something more, and B.'s right something less, than the right as ordinarily understood of a judgment creditor. The object of this contention was to postpone B. on proof of the allegation that he had notice of A.'s interest in the land. It is laid down in Sugden's "Vendors and Purchasers," 13th ed. p. 599, that "a purchaser (of land in a register county) with notice of a prior unregistered incumbrance, is bound by it;" and further, that "a purchaser may in equity be bound by a judgment or a deed, although not registered." It was strenuously contended by A.'s counsel that the rule stated in these passages applied to a judgment creditor as much as to a purchaser; but Vice-Chancellor Wood said:—"With regard to a subsequent judgment-creditor (he was not speaking of a purchaser) he had come to the conclusion that the question of notice was wholly immaterial." The reason given by his Honour for this conclusion will explain the remark we made above, that A.'s counsel endeavoured, in his argument, to depress B. into the position of a purchaser. "The whole doctrine," said his Honour, "of notice proceeds upon this, that when a man has created a charge affecting his estate, he himself is not at liberty to enter into a new contract in derogation of that charge. The Court would not allow him to do a wrong; and if he could not do it himself, no one could help him to do it by engaging to part with money for his benefit, or to release him from difficulties, knowing that it was contrary to his duty to do the net proposed to be done." But this principle did not affect the judgment creditor, who was acting in invitum. "The conscience of a purchaser was affected by notice, through the medium of the person with whom he entered into the contract, but the conscience of the judgment creditor was not thus affected. He was not assisting his debtor, but simply stood upon his own rights."

Looking, now, to the Middlesex Registry Act, 7 Ann. c. 208, s. 18, we find that it enacts that no judgment shall affect or bind lands, but only from the time that a memorial shall be entered at the registry office. It has been decided in Westbrook v. Blyth (3 Ell. & B. 742) that the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, did not repeal the 7 Ann. c. 20; and, therefore, that a judgment registered in the Common Pleas would have the effect of a charge upon lands in Middlesex only from the time that the judgment had been also registered in the Middlesex registry. The notion of a personal equity affecting the judgment creditor on the ground of notice having been got rid of, the case last cited was decisive of the question, B. having registered his judgment in Middlesex in 1846 was preferred to A., who had not registered until 1857.

A further question arose upon the general law of registry between B., who had neglected until 1858 to re-register his judgment in the Common Pleas, and a mortgagee of a purchaser from the original debtor. We have seen that B.'s judgment was registered in the Common Pleas in 1846. In 1847 the debtor mortgaged to C., and in 1850 he conveyed the equity of redemption to him. In 1853, after the effect of B.'s registration was spent, C. mortgaged to D. It appeared that D. had notice of B.'s judgment. The counsel for D. relied upon the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 2, which provides that no judgment shall affect lands "as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors," unless a memorandum shall have been left at the Common Pleas Office, any notice to any such purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor notwithstanding. This Act does not expressly refer to the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, requiring re-registration after five years; but the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 5, has declared that it applies to the neglect of repeated as well as of original registration. Upon this question, whether a mortgagee of a purchaser from the judgment debtor was within the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 2, Vice-Chancellor Wood held that the proper construction of the Act was, that whenever there was a judgment registered against any owner of the land, that judgment must be kept up by the creditor from five years to five years, if he wished to affect that land into whatsoever hands it passed. Nothing was said in the Act as to the person by whom the conveyance or mortgage was to be made; but the words were large enough to confer the benefit intended by the Act on all bonâ fide purchasers and mortgagees deriving titles from the judgment debtor. It was, therefore, held that B. must be postponed to D.

COMMON LAW.

PRACTICE—MISJOINDER OF PLAINTIFFS—23 & 24 VICT. c. 126, s. 19.

Bellingham v. Clarke, Q. B., 9 W. R. 667.

This was an attempt to make the provision in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1861, which enacts that "the joinder of too many plaintiffs shall not be fatal, but that every action may be brought in the name of all the persons in whom the legal right may be supposed to exist," subserve a purpose certainly never intended by the framers of that measure—namely, to abrogate the well known and useful rule which forbids the joinder of two plaintiffs in one and the same action, one of whom appears by the declaration to claim in his own right, and the other in a representative character. Here the declaration was for money paid to the defendant's use by A. (one of the plaintiffs) and B. the testator of the other plaintiff, and it was successfully demurred to on the ground that both plaintiffs could not on the face of the record be entitled to recover; for if it was a joint debt, the right to sue thereon would have survived to A.; and, if otherwise, then A. should have sued for what he advanced in one action, and B. in another action should have sued as executor or administrator in respect of the residue.

Trew v. The Railway Passengers Assurance Co., 9 W. R. 671.

In noticing some weeks ago the case of Sinclair v. Mari- *time Passengers Assurance Co.—in which it was held that a death in consequence of a "sun stroke" did not come within the meaning of the contingency provided against by the policy, of an injury to be sustained by the assured "from or by reason or in consequence of an accident to him happening," but rather resulted from a natural cause—that is to say, an inflammatory disease of the brain brought on by over exposure to the heat of the sun—it was remarked that the present case (in which judgment had been given by the Court of Exchequer in favour of the defendant) was, to a certain extent an authority against the claimants on the policy in the case then under discussion; for that in the judgments delivered by the Barons, there were observations used which tended to define and narrow the circumstances under which a death could be held to have happened by an accident. It is proper, therefore, to remark that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, in that case, has now been reversed in error; but not on any ground which would have influenced the Court of Queen's Bench in their judgment, with respect to a death by sunstroke not being, in the intentment of the law, accidental.

LAW OF EVIDENCE—PRIVILEGE OF WITNESS NOT TO CRIMINATE HIMSELF.

Reg. v. Boyes, Q. B., 9 W. R. 690.

When noticing recently the case of Fernandez,† it was remarked that there was another question involved, though not mentioned in the judgment (which proceeded on other grounds) and that this was whether, when a witness is asked a question which he is unwilling to answer as tending to his crimination, he or the presiding judge is the person to decide whether it will have the apprehended effect; and that the Court of Exchequer intimated their opinion to be that the judge ought to decide; and this, notwithstanding certain dicta to the contrary to be found in Fisher v. Ronalds, 12 C.B. 765, and Adams v. Lloyd, 3 H. & N. 357. Shortly after this opinion was reported, the Court of Queen's Bench, in the present case, had occasion expressly to decide the point (which is one of very considerable interest and importance), and they have settled it as suggested in re Fernandez, which is obviously the most convenient solution for the purposes of justice; for if a witness's being obliged to answer is to depend on the view taken by himself, as to his own safety in consequence, an humane protection afforded to him by the law is likely enough to be often abused.

The present case, in the circumstances under which it arose, much resembled that of Fernandez. In both the proceeding was a prosecution for bribery, and in both a witness, in the exercise of the above privilege, objected to answer whether he had received a bribe from the defendant. In the case of Fernandez, the witness had obtained a certificate under 15 & 16 Vic. c. 57, purporting to protect him against all future pains and penalties in respect of his having received a bribe; but in the present case, on his objecting to answer, a pardon under the great seal was tendered to him, as a means of obviating the only danger which the witness could apprehend,—it being admitted that the only ground for the exercise of the privilege was, that in consequence of his self-crimination, some penal proceedings might, or might reasonably be expected to be instituted against him; and in both instances the ground on which the witness still persisted in refusing to answer, was that the document he was called upon to rely on as a sufficient protection, would not operate against an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. In the case of Fernandez, it will be remembered that the witness persisting in his refusal, was committed to prison by the judge, and that with this sentence the Court of Queen's Bench refused to interfere. In the present case an arrangement was come to by the counsel engaged, and sanctioned by the judge, that the witness should answer the disputed question; subject to its being taken as evidence, only in the event of the same Court being of opinion that the tender and acceptance of the Queen's pardon destroyed the privilege. The Court, taking into consideration the shadowy nature of the risk of a parliamentary impeachment, held that the privilege was destroyed by the pardon, and consequently gave judgment for the Crown. But they went further than this, and gave a deliberate opinion as to the other point involved in the case, though scarcely required for the purpose of the judgment alone; and laid down the doctrine (in accordance with the ruling of Lord Wensleydale in Osborne v. The London Dock Co., 10 Exch. 701) that to entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence, the Court must see from the circumstances of the case, and the nature of the evidence the witness is called upon to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to him from his being compelled to answer. And further, that a judge is bound to insist on a witness answering, unless he is satisfied that the answer will tend to put the witness in peril, that is, in a danger real and appreciable with reference to the ordinary operation of law in the ordinary course of things, and not a danger of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct.

DEVISE OF REAL ESTATE.

I should feel obliged by some of your readers favouring me with a reply to the following query:—

S. by will devises his real estate to "A. for her natural life, and at her decease I give the said premises to the children of H., to be equally divided amongst them." H. had several children, and all survived the testator. S. H., one of those children, dies in the lifetime of A., the tenant for life, and by will gives all his realty and personalty to his widow. Q. Does S. H. take an absolute vested interest as tenant in common in fee in his share so as to enable his widow to stand in the same place as S. H. would have done with the other children if he had survived the tenant for life, and take her share of the rents and proceeds of the estate when sold? J. N. C.

IRISH ANTE-UNION STATUTES.

In an article in the last number of the Solicitors' Journal, on a settlement case at Warwick Quarter Sessions, which involved a question of Irish marriage law, it is said:—"As English courts do not take judicial cognizance of Irish statutes passed before the union, which must, therefore, be proved to those courts as facts, an Irish barrister deposed," &c.

Any one who holds the opinion thus expressed must, it would seem, either overlook or disregard the Act 41 Geo. 3 (U. K.), c. 90, which enacts (s. 9) that the copy of the statutes of the Kingdom of Ireland, made by the Parliament of the same prior to the union, and printed and published by the printer duly authorised by his Majesty, or any of his royal predecessors, to print and publish the same, shall be received as conclusive evidence of the several statutes made by the Parliament of Ireland, prior to the union of the Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, in all suits, actions, or prosecutions, in any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain.

THE NEW PROBATE ORDER.

I see that it is assumed in an article in another law journal, that the New Order of the Court of Probate, which requires the district registrars to act as the solicitors of parties applying in person for probate or administration, applies to London as well as the country. It is obvious, however, that the writer of the article to which I allude, has never taken the trouble to read as much as the title of the General Order in question. If he had done so he might have learned that it relates only to "the District Registries of the Court of Probate." It is absurd, therefore, to speak of the order being only "of small effect in London." I hope that this blunder will not be adopted in any of the memorials to the Treasury which are now in course of signature.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

EXECUTION OF ENGLISH JUDGMENTS IN FRANCE AGAINST FRENCH SUBJECTS.

Other decisions of the French courts upon the subject of my last article, (ante, p. 590), offering me an opportunity of returning to the same, I will here attempt to give your readers some further information with respect to the execution of foreign judgments in France. In my remarks upon the judgment of the Imperial Court of Paris, in the case of the British Screw Ship Company, I demurred to a dictum in that judgment with reference to a presumed right in a Frenchman to ignore an action brought by himself in a foreign country against a subject of that country, and to bring the same action de novo in France, by virtue of article 14 of the Code Napoleon, which enacts as follows:—"An alien, even though not resident in France, may be sued in the French courts to compel him to execute the engagements contracted by him in France in favour of a French subject; he may likewise be sued in the French tribunals for the engagements contracted by him in a foreign country in favour of a French subject." Now the question is, whether the French subject cannot lose this privilege. Some contend that he cannot—that it sticks to him volens volens, whatever may have been his proceedings. Others, and I have shown that the weight of authority lies that way, maintain that he is estopped from claiming the privilege against his alien antagonist, whenever he has of his own free will waived the same, either by beginning, without any compulsion to take such a course, his suit against the alien in a foreign country, or by agreeing—to submit his suit to the jurisdiction of foreign judges; in which cases he would either be barred according to circumstances by lis pendens or res judicata in the first, or estopped by his own agreement in the second, from claiming his privilege under article 14.

An example of such an agreement occurs in the following case:—A Mr. Reid, by a charter-party made in London, freighted a steam vessel named the Alice, to the firm of Couillard & Fautrel, of Havre. The charter-party contained a clause to the following effect:—"Every difference which shall arise between the parties with reference to this charter-party shall be submitted to the arbitration of two persons selected respectively by each party. Such two persons shall have authority to join unto themselves a third, and the decision of the majority of the three arbitrators shall be final and binding upon both parties." Some time afterwards Couillard & Fautrel wished to break the contract, and in consequence arbitrators were named under the above clause; but their award was favourable to the validity of the charter-party, which was ordered to be carried out. Subsequently, and in consequence of this decision, another French firm, Allain & Co., subfreighted the Alice from Couillard & Fautrel with a clause endorsing the conditions of the original charter-party. However, Allain & Co. showed no disposition to further the carrying out of those conditions, for, notwithstanding the demands of the master of the Alice, of the name of Bouden, to that effect, they refused to insert in the bills of lading which they gave out such clauses as would insure the execution of the same. And on Bouden's insisting that the bills of lading should state that the conditions were to be the same as those embodied in the original charter-party, Allain & Co. brought an action against Couillard & Fautrel in the Tribunal of Rochefort, to cause the latter to compel Bouden to desist from his pretensions, and for damages; and the latter was summoned by Couillard & Fautrel to interplead in the action. They likewise brought another action against him in the same Court, as agent of Reid, the original freighter, to the same effect as that laid before and rejected by the London arbitrators, namely, to have the charter party made with Reid set aside. But Bouden demurred to the latter suit, on the ground that there had been res judicata by the arbitrators elected under the agreement in the charter party, and to the action of Allain and Co., by reason of their having adopted that same clause of the charter party, and being, therefore, estopped from bringing their action in any but the court instituted by the same. To this Allain Couillard & Fautrel replied that the clause in question was void in France, as being a clause compromissoire, or arbitration clause, wanting, in the ingredients required for the validity of the same by article 1006 of the code of French procedure, namely, the choice of the arbitrators, and the specification of the litigious matter. Couillard & Fautrel added, with respect to the suit in which they had compelled Bouden to interplead, that the interpleader must of necessity take place in the court where the original action was brought; that the venue of that brought by Allain & Co. against them was laid in the Tribunal of Rochefort, and that, therefore, Bouden could not demur to the jurisdiction of that court.

These views were adopted by the Tribunal of Rochefort, which accordingly declared its jurisdiction over the case. Its judgment, however, was reversed on appeal by the Imperial Court of Poitiers, the judgment or arrêt of which was in its turn assailed by a pourvoi or writ of error in the Court of Cassation. But the Court of Cassation confirmed the judgment of the Court of Poitiers in an arret, which, after setting forth the facts of the case, lays down the law as follows:—"The Court.....on the first point: whereas, a French subject may waive this privilege of applying to the French Courts, granted to him by the article 14 of the Code Napoleon;—And the plaintiffs in cassation, have, by the charter party of the 13th February, 1858, signed in London, agreed to submit their differences to arbitrators, to be named in that city: whereas the plaintiffs contend that such clause is not to be taken into account as being an arbitration clause framed without regard to the article 1006 of the Code of Procedure, and that therefore the defendant cannot take his stand on the said clause to repudiate the jurisdiction of the courts of France; but whereas the plaintiffs have voluntarily executed the said clause by co-operating in the elections of the said arbitrators and entering before them into the differences having arisen between the said plaintiffs and Reid represented in the present suit by Boden: whereas in reversing the judgment of the Court below, which had declared invalid the arbitration clause, the Court most properly abstained from expressing any opinion upon the validity of the said clause, a point which could not be mooted after the execution of the same by the parties. As to Allain & Co., whereas they hold their rights from Couillard & Fautrel, and therefore stand in the same position as their assignors: whereas furthermore it has been decided in fact by the court below that they had expressly accepted the conditions laid down by the charter-party of the 13th of February, 1858; whereas in denying the jurisdiction of the French courts on the ground of the judicial contract contained in the charter-party of the execution of that contract by Couillard & Fautrel, and of the acceptance of the conditions of the said charter by Allain & Co. The Court below has given sufficient and satisfactory motives for its decision.

"On the second point concerning the judgment in which Allain & Co. appear as principal plaintiffs. Whereas it has been decided in fact that the arbitration agreement contained in the original charter-party had been made binding on Allain & Co. as well as on Couillard & Fautrel: whereas if the articles 59 and 181 of the Code of Procedure enact that the judge of the original action shall be likewise that of the interpleader, that rule does not apply where, as in the case, an agreement binding upon the parties in either, has elected a special jurisdiction for the case: whereas, therefore, the Court below by deciding that Allain & Co., as well as the original charterers, were bound to submit to the jurisdiction agreed upon with the affreighter Reid, of whom Boden is the agent, has violated no law, rejects the writs of error (pourvois)."

So much for the validity of an agreement by which a French subject gives up the protection of the article 14 of the Code Napoleon. All persons who have dealings with French subjects, and who would dislike to be involved in a suit in the French courts, will do well to take the hint.

The following is an instance where a Frenchman was considered as not having lost the privilege of the article 14 by having brought an action against an alien in a foreign court, because it had been done only under the pressure of necessity:—A French vessel named Le Courier des Indes, belonging to M. De Beauveau Craon having suffered from stress of weather he took her into Manilla to refit, and made with the house of Jenny & Co., in that port, an agreement in some form or other by which they were to furnish him with the funds necessary to make the repairs. There was between them, however, some disagreement which caused De Beauveau Craon to sue Jenny & Co., in the Court of Binondo, on the ground of their not carrying out their agreement; but a judgment of the 18th July, 1853, not only rejected his suit, but sentenced him to pay certain sums to the defendants. This judgment was subsequently confirmed on appeal.

In the meanwhile De Beauveau had returned to France, and applied to his underwriters for the payment of the sums insured by them on his vessel. But this was prevented by attachments which Jenny & Co. had put into the hands of the underwriters for the amount given in their favour by the judgment in the action of De Beauveau against them at Binondo. This, however was resisted by De Beauveau, who revived before the tribunal of Havre, in which the venues were laid, the very same pleas which he had brought forward, and which had been rejected by the Court of Binondo. This Jenny & Co., therefore, demurred to, both on the pleas of the res judicata, in the judgment in the Court below; and lis pendens of the appeal in the Appellate Court, which had not at that moment been disposed of. The tribunal of Havre, however, ruled against Jenny & Co., and decided that Beauveau Craon was not barred from profiting of the privilege of the Article 14 of the Code Napoleon, and bringing his action against Jenny & Co. before the French Courts, although he had already himself opened and prosecuted the same to a final judgment in a foreign court, because such a course had not been optional in him, but a matter of necessity under the circumstances. Jenny & Co. appealed from this to the Court of Rouen; their appeal was rejected by a judgment of the 9th of February, 1859, grounded on the same reasons, and of which it is unnecessary to give the terms, but against which they brought a pourvoi or writ of error in the Court of Cassation, and upon which the judgment of the latter sufficiently epitomises the arguments on both sides. It runs as follows:—"The Court: whereas, by the terms of the Article 14 of the Code Napoleon, an alien may be sued in the French Courts by a Frenchman for engagements contracted with the latter in a foreign country; that the said enactment, founded on public policy, ceases to apply only when the French subject has waived the privilege granted to him by the same, and that such waiver has been free and voluntary; that such is not the case where a Frenchman has sued an alien before a foreign court in emergencies where the freedom of the person or the execution of urgent contracts are jeopardised, and that, under such circumstances, the French subject cannot be considered as having given up all right to claim the protection of the judges of his own country as soon as may be; that thence follows the duty for the French judges to look into the circumstances which have determined the French subject to bring his action in the foreign courts: whereas the judgment of the Court below affirms, as a proven fact, that it was not of his free and unconstrained will that de Beauveau Craon brought the action against Jenny & Co. in the Court of Manilla; that such is a dictum of fact upon which the judgment of the Court below is final, and is, besides, justified by the documents and facts of the cause; that, therefore, the defendant in the present suit having acted under the pressure of circumstances which, to a certain extent, deprived him of the freedom of his will, had the right to appeal to article 14 of the Code Napoleon on returning to France rejects the writ of error."

This is in accordance with the principles and authorities quoted in my last.

THE CASE OF MIREs—FRENCH CRIMINAL LAW.

The well-known banker and speculator has just been tried in the Court of Correctional Police (Tribunal de Police Correctionnelle) for alleged misdemeanours and malpractices committed in the vast speculations which have given such a sudden rise to his fortunes. Is he, as he alleges, the victim of a plot hatched by his enemies and his rivals? It is not for me to decide. My purpose is not with the causes of the prosecution, but with the prosecution itself, by means of the incidents of which I will attempt to give to your readers some notion of the theory and practice of the French penal procedure and its peculiar defects, which are great. Many portions of the law of France deserve the highest admiration and might be and are imitated with advantage, and the ensemble of the fabric is highly symmetrical and commodious; but the criminal law is certainly not among the portions which deserve such an eulogium. It requires no information but that derived from its spirit to discover at what time it was contrived. The power given to the machinery of the prosecution, the continual sacrifice which is made to the general interest, of the private interest of the accused (as if that also did not involve a great general interest) sufficiently prove that it was not brought forth at a time when France was much troubled with liberty; but when, on the contrary, it was laid under the protection of a strong government, which was well aware of the advantage of having a powerful hold of the sword of justice. But the Code d'Instruction Criminelle or Code of Criminal Procedure, and the Code Penal or Code of Penalties, were promulgated in the full bloom of the first empire, and they bear the undeniable stamp of the times under which they were born. Inasmuch as the best way to give an idea of the principle of a machine is to set it working, I cannot do better than display the spirit of the Code d'Instruction Criminelle by showing it in full operation in the prosecution of M. Mirès. As is well known he is, or rather was, a wealthy banker. Many of the largest and boldest financial undertakings of the day were promoted by him. Most of these he had formed for the benefit and through the instrumentality of the caisse des chemins de fer, which he had established with the view of furthering great financial undertakings. This caisse des chemins de fer was a company en commandite, the capital of which had been progressively raised to the large sum of two million sterling, and to make its speculations more successful he had purchased for the same a financial paper—the Journal des Chemins de Fer and two political papers, the Pays and the Constitutionnel. With these he was enabled to operate most powerfully on the market, and had succeeded in compassing undertakings which seemed impossible to any but coalitions of the largest capitalists, and in bringing them to a considerable pitch of prosperity; but, as usual, the greater the success, the greater the amount of enmity he excited. To this he attributes his fall. However, whether from the hostile combinations of envy, or the reverses of speculation, he was, at a certain period, driven to straits which gave a hold upon him to his enemies. Of these, the most active and the most interested was a certain Baron de Pontalba, who was member of the council of surveillance of the Caisse des Chemins de Fer, and some of the satellite undertakings which gravitated around the same. The opportunities he had in these various functions allowed him to collect information as to certain transactions of Mirés which bore a suspicious appearance, and he determined to use this information for his own benefit. Some time previously, in his capacity of member of the Council of Surveillance, he had been deputed by Mirés to go to Marseilles and to Rome to settle certain difficulties which had arisen in the way of the company of the port of Marseilles and that of the Roman railroad. This was a portion of his duty in his official capacity. He demanded, however, £20,000 for going to Marseilles, and £48,000 for arranging matters at Rome, where he had, he alleged, been obliged to negotiate fork in hand. Dinners seem to be as favourable to business in the financial as in the diplomatic world. Mirés having demurred to the claim, M. de Pontalba's vindictive feelings seem to have been roused, and he threatened Mirés both with a civil and a criminal prosecution, on the ground of the facts he had discovered, and which he expressed himself ready to reveal. Mirés having refused with considerable, but, as it turned out, ill-omened spirit, to succumb to these demands, for the certainly somewhat plausible reasons that they were exorbitant, when it was M. de Pontalba's duty, as member of the Council of Surveillance, to give service gratuitously; and that as to the complaints against him, if there were any, it was the member of the Council of Supervision's duty to have made them before he was prompted to do so by such interested motives. M. de Pontalba then realised his threats, and in consequence of his accusations, the seals were put by the juge d'instruction on the books and offices of Mirés. This alarmed the latter, who felt immediately alive to the ruinous consequences a criminal prosecution would have to himself, and all the interests under his direction, and supposing, for what reason does not appear, that notwithstanding the rule of French law which prevents any compounding with private parties having the effect of staying the public prosecutor, he consented to compromise with M. de Pontalba, and paid him £36,000.

This payment took place on the 18th of December, and the seals were taken the next day from the books of Mirés. But this was only a momentary lull in the storm. The 15th and 16th of February we find his books seized again. The 17th he is arrested. Mirés is fairly in the hands of the prosecution, and we are now going to see it at work.

The prosecution in France is in all except a very limited number of cases ex officio. Private parties may put it into motion by complaints or indictments, and co-operate with it, in the view to obtain damages; but the suing out of the application to the delinquent of the penalties of the law belongs only to a peculiar institution called the Ministère Public, or public ministry. As the name sufficiently shows it is established for the purpose of protecting the public interest. There sits, in every civil court, a member of the public ministry, whose duty is to watch the proceedings, and interfere in all such as are likely to interest public order, policy, or those private interests the protection of which the law considers as of public importance. There, however, the Ministère Public is only an adjunct to the cause; whereas, in all penal jurisdictions, he sits as the prosecuting party. The chief of the Ministère Public within the jurisdiction of each imperial court or court of appeal is the Procureur, or Attorney-General. He has advocates-general and substitutes, who represent him in the Imperial Court and in the various tribunals of first instance within the jurisdiction of that court. The Procureur-Imperial, or imperial attorney, with his substitutes, all of whom act not in their personal capacity, but under the direction and responsibility of the Procureur-General, who is par excellence the Ministère-public, and of whom they are only so many proxies. The prosecution, as a rule, is begun in the tribunal of first instance; and, therefore, by the Procureur-Imperial, or one of his substitutes; and the first step thereof is a requisitoire, or requisition, of the ministère-public to the juge d'instruction to instruire, or investigate, the case, and collect the evidence. The juge d'instruction is a judge of the tribunal of first instance, who is chosen by the minister of justice to fulfil those functions. He is named for a period of three years, but remains in office till another is named, which will not very soon happen if he gives satisfaction. His duties, though in many respects unenviable, are generally cheerfully accepted, because they give the nominee a greater chance of displaying his activity and zeal than mere judicial functions, and offer him, therefore, a greater chance of promotion. He is the examining magistrate, but unfortunately he is not that alone. His duties are, to a certain extent, inquisitorial. He it is who collects the evidence and makes up the case. In theory he is supposed to do nothing without being prompted thereto by the prosecutor; but in practice, if I may use the expression, as soon as his steam has been put up by the first requisitions of the Ministère-Public, he goes on investigating the case; and when he has hunted down what he considers the truth, he communicates the minutes of the evidence and the other documents to the public prosecutor, who makes his requisitions as to there being a true bill or no bill against the accused, and the juge d'instruction either discharges him, or, to use English phraseology, finds a true bill against him; and according as the charge bears the character of a misdemeanour or a felony (délit or crime), he commits him for trial to the Correctional Tribunal (a section of that of first instance), or makes his report to the Chamber of Accusation of the Imperial Court, which, if it agrees with the conclusion of the report, and if the public prosecutor in that chamber, takes requisition to that effect, and decides that the prisoner shall be arraigned in the Court of Assizes. Now, let us pause and reflect upon the attributes of the juge d'instruction. He it is who in reality makes up the whole case. He it is who interrogates the prisoner, who summons and interrogates the witnesses, who preserves the various physical elements which constitute the corpus delicti, or the vestiges by which it is to be traced. How will he fulfil these delicate duties? conscientiously, no doubt! He will use his strongest efforts to discover the truth—to open an equally willing mind to the arguments in favour of the accusation and the defence. But will not there be, or may not there be, a moment when an opinion is in process of formation in the judge's mind? And what if that be unfavourable to the prisoner? No doubt the judge will do his best to be unbiassed; but will he always succeed? Will not these elements of evidence, of which he is the sole collector, little by little be warped and moulded according to the bent taken by his mind? And what will that bent habitually be? No deep cogitation is necessary to answer that question. His duty is to find out guilt where it is; and the first desideratum to find it is of course to suspect it; to thrust in every direction, to probe everything with the glance of suspicion. Suspicion must, therefore, be the chronic condition of a juge d'instruction's mind. When, therefore, a prisoner comes before him with resolute denials, and a firm and well-connected defence, is it very unreasonable to suppose that there may arise in him that spirit of angry contention with which one is prompted to meet clever deceit? And to judge how dangerous the consequences to the prisoner, if such a spirit should arise in the examining magistrate, let us take a glance at his proceedings, and follow him into his little office in the Palais de Justice, where he sits, day by day, industriously weaving the web of the prosecution. There he sits, together with his greffier, or clerk; and the prisoner just taken out for the purpose from the solitude of secret confinement, from the prison where, ignorant, not only of what may concern his case, but the fate of his dearest relations, he has not been allowed to communicate either with them or with his counsel, and where, therefore, he has lived a prey to an anxiety which must leave him but little nerve for any contest. And in that state, alone—for all the part of the investigation is secret, and no assistance or counsel is allowed to reach the prisoner—he must confront a cool and able man of business, clothed in all the majesty of dread authority, who can at his leisure well plunge into and deliver him from the secret, and who plies him with such questions as his practised intellect may devise. And the clerk is there who takes down every answer of the prisoner. Not a shorthand-writer, mind, but a man who may not have a first-class capacity or education, and who has to condense in his minutes the substance of the dialogue which takes place before him. It is true that the prisoner has to sign the minutes, and may decline to do so should he consider them incorrect; but if he be an illiterate man, ignorant of the value of words, or a timid one, overawed by the dignity of a magistrate upon whom his fate appears so entirely to depend, is it likely that he will presume to contend with him about niceties of expression? And yet from those minutes will be drawn the report of the judge, and the act of accusation or statement of the case for the Crown, by which the case will be opened in the assizes, and from which the first impressions of the jury will be drawn. In the same way will things go with the witness, and with the difference that they are not in prison. The high honour and capacity of the judges will, no doubt, prompt them to set everything right; but it suffices that such consequence should be within the range of possibility to condemn so dangerous a system. More especially as the current is so strong that it may unconsciously carry the magistrate along with it, and in this very case there is a striking example of this.

Mirés being accused of fraudulent transactions, it was of course necessary to investigate his books, in which the true nature of these transactions would appear, and Mirés being involved in the most enormous and intricate transactions which he himself conducted, it would be a matter of considerable difficulty to extract the truth therefrom. Anybody who has ever had anything to do with commercial cases can easily understand that. It was, therefore, necessary to employ professional book-keepers as experts. Who names these experts? Are they jointly named by the prosecution and the defence, since the latter is quite as interested as the former in the investigation? No, they are named by the juge d'instruction alone. Are they at least commissioned, since they are as it were the eyes of justice in this matter, to look impartially at both sides of the question, and collect without distinction such materials as may furnish evidence to either side? Let us read the commission which is issued to them by the judge, and that will inform us. It runs as nearly as possible literally as follows:—"We order that by Isoard, inspector of finances, Van Himbeek and Monginot, experts in book-keeping, after they shall have taken an oath at our hands, examination shall be made of all the books, documents, and papers which shall be put at their disposal, for the purpose of discovering the proof of the facts aforesaid, as well as of all such of which the accused may have been guilty, and which are of a nature to come under the penal law, and authorizes the experts to get all the necessary information from all such persons as may be able to furnish it." I have neither time nor space to comment upon the document, nor will it be necessary, especially to lawyers. I will only say, if the expert be not a man of intelligence and fair feeling, or if he be desirous of propitiating the juge d'instruction (not that I mean to insinuate such was the case in the present instance), for the purpose of obtaining further employment by chiming in with what he may have discovered to be his bias, what will not be the danger of the prisoners? That the counsel for the defence were not satisfied with the way the experts had done their duty in this case is clear; for they, as well as the prisoner himself, accused them in the strongest language of having exhibited as guilty transactions which would shine forth with the fullest innocence, if they had been but fully displayed; and when we recollect that the experts, with the books at their fullest and exclusive disposal, had been months in building up their report, and that the defence had only a few days to go through this vast tract and prove its all its parts, what must not have been their feeling at its discovery? When I say that the defence had a few days, I think they had about a fortnight, for which they applied; a request in which the substitute of the procureur imperial, M. Senart, who prosecuted in this case in the courts (and who, to do him justice, acted in this case in a most fair and honourable manner) most heartily joined. But this very application was the source of the discovery of a strange arrangement, or at least omission, of the French law on a most important point. The counsel for Mirés, on applying for time to examine his books, and compare them with the report, demanded likewise that Mirés should be taken out of prison, and taken to his office under safe custody, to give him the opportunity of furnishing his counsel with the necessary documents and explanations. This one would think reasonable request met with considerable difficulty; and here comes the peculiarity. The Court declared that they had not power to direct these measures, and that they, as well as the production of the books, must be allowed by the ministère public. The law of this decision I believe questionable; but does it not seem strange that there should be a doubt whether the defence is not to depend upon the prosecution, the adverse side for the weapons with which it is to meet it; and that the Court should have no authority to order a proper dispensation of the same, should the prosecution be backward or niggardly therein? However, in this case, the prosecutor was by no means so; but, on the contrary, as liberal as he could well be, but it is a strange and unreasonable thing that the defence should be dependents upon his courtesy for the exercise of its most sacred rights.

But to return to the proceedings of the prosecutor. After the investigations, the juge d'instruction having discovered no felony in the transactions of Mirés (he had been originally suspected of forgery), decrees upon the requisition of the ministère public that Mirés shall be arraigned in the tribunal of correctional police. A citation is notified to him accordingly, and he prepares to appear before his judges. Nearly five months have elapsed since the prison doors have closed upon him: he has frequently, during that time, complained of harsh treatment, unjustly, I believe, though the prison discipline might well appear irksome and harsh to one of his habits, activity and situation. He has likewise complained of his imprisonment as unusually long. Alas! that complaint likewise is ungrounded. The length of the preliminary confinements to which he has been subjected is by no means unusual, and that is one of the greatest hardships arising out of the French criminal practice, and which it has been frequently, but as yet vainly been attempted to remedy.

I have little more to add. As to the particulars of the trial, they are all in the papers. The president proceeded according to the usual practice to interrogate the prisoner and the witnesses conducting the case, and doing what is in England the province of the counsel on both sides; after which exciting work, he of course had to settle down into the calm frame of mind of the judge to pass on Mirés the sentence of five years' imprisonment, the highest penalty of the law for the offence. The only member of the Council of Surveillance who has been condemned is Count Simeon, as civilly responsible for the damages to the aggrieved parties. Mirés will no doubt appeal, as he cannot fare worse, M. de Pontalba has been acquitted from all responsibility.

TRIBUNAL OF COMMERCE.

The installation of the newly-elected judges of the Tribunal of Commerce took place on the 6th inst., with the usual formalities, and M. Deniere, the President, delivered an address, in which he gave an account of the business of the Tribunal during the year, from the 1st of July, 1860, to the 30th of June, 1861. The following are the principal points in his statement:—The number of new causes inscribed was 67,693, and on adding those standing over from the preceding year the total to be heard was 68,558. Of that number 41,442 were decided by default, 20,134 after hearing the parties, 3,713 were withdrawn, in 2,349 arrangements were made, and the rest remain to be judged. The 68,558 were 3,140 more than in the preceding year. The number of appeals from decisions of the tribunal presented to the Imperial Court was 824, and that standing over from the preceding year 653. The total to be decided was, consequently, 1,477, and in 417 cases the judgments of the Tribunal were confirmed, in 186 they were quashed, in 207 the parties came to an arrangement, and the rest remain to be heard. The number of appeals from decisions of the Council of Prud'hommes presented to the Tribunal was 71, and in 31 the decisions were confirmed, in 18 set aside, in 17 the parties came to an arrangement, and the remainder are to be disposed of. The number of bankruptcies declared was 1,296 and those standing over from the preceding year 1,253. The total was, consequently, 2,549, in 1,378 of which the proceedings have been brought to a close. Of the bankruptcies terminated, 512 were arranged by composition between debtors and creditors, the dividend given being in twelve cases from 5 to 10 per cent., in 65 from 10 to 20, in 151 from 20 to 30, in 75 cases from 30 to 40, in 57 from 40 to 50, in 23 from 50 to 60, in 13 from 60 to 80, and in 28 the whole capital was paid. In 136 cases there were no assets at all. The credits of the bankruptcies open at the end of the year amounted to 8,937,365*f.*, and of that sum 889,992*f.* were deposited in the Caisse des Consignations. The amount ordered to be paid to creditors in the course of the year was 8,503,843*f.* The number of new companies in shares registered was 1,330, of which 1,027 were what is called non collectif, 291 en commandite, 12 anonymes. The total was 10 more than in the preceding year. The capital of the companies en commandite was on the 30th of June, 81,770,000*f.*, and that declared in the companies in non collectif, 17,576,000*f.*; that of the anonymes is not stated. In the preceding year that of the first was 117,000,000*f.*, and of the second 21,900,000*f.* Finally, the number of companies dissolved in the course of the year was 942. In the course of his address the President stated that the great failures in the leather trade in London, and the diminution in trade with America, caused by the political crisis in that country, had produced bankruptcies in Paris." He also pointed to the decline in the capital of companies en commandite as a proof that the law of the 17th of July, 1856, on such associations does not work well; and he said that the adoption of the principles of English legislation on joint stock companies would be desirable.

Review.

A Treatise on Wills. By THOMAS JARMAN, Esq. The Third Edition. By E. P. WOLSTENHOLME, M.A., and S. VINCENT, B.A., of Lincoln's-inn, and the Inner Temple, Barristers-at-Law. H. Sweet, 3, Chancery-lane, London; Hodges & Smith, Dublin. 1861.

The first edition of Mr. Jarman's Treatise on Wills incorporated a large portion of the matter contained in his edition of "Powell on Devises," and in the 10th volume of the Bytewood series of "Precedents in Conveyancing," amplified by the judicial and legislative donations conferred upon this branch of law since the publication of those works, and enriched by the author's then more matured opinions. About one-half of the first edition consisted of completely new matter. The additions contained in the subsequent editions are, of course, of the same character, so that the work now before us comprises a large amount of original disquisition. The method of inserting the editorial additions within brackets, which was observed in the second edition, is continued in the present, being considered by the editors as more convenient than an arrangement of their contributions in notes or an appendix. Serjeant Stephen has so familiarised our early impressions with this method, that its inherent awkwardness at present escapes observation. It is not, however, a course which we desire to see generally adopted, and reminds us of a classic building, the needful repairs of which are unnecessarily notified by too fresh-looking bricks and mortar. The cases published since 1st February, 1861, are, in the present edition, noticed partly in the text and partly in the addenda.

It is not easy for the reader of Jarman on Wills to determine whether he should bestow his admiration more on the excellence of the general arrangement of that work, or on the philosophical method and the accuracy of its details. We shall best discharge our present duty by endeavouring to give a brief account of the general scope of this masterpiece of professional art.

The first chapter relates to the local laws of wills, and in the first place informs us that testamentary powers are regulated as to realty by the lex loci rei sitæ, and, as to personalty, by the lex domicilii; but that treaty may alter the latter rule. Thus, Englishmen domiciled in Turkey may, by treaty, dispose of their property, though subjects of the Porte cannot. The case of Bremer v. Freeman, 5 W. R. 618, which has suggested to Lord Kingsdown the propriety of facilitating international conventions contravening the lex domicilii, receives illustration from two cases cited in the first chapter of this treatise, Collier v. Rimas, Curt. 85, and Laneville v. Anderson, 17 Jur. 511, which decided, in different ways, the question of the mode of acquiring a French domicile. A will may be made contingent, and be written in pencilling, and with blank spaces. If an instrument is testamentary in its nature, its form as a deed, or even as a bill of exchange (2 Rob. 228), will not defeat its operation as a will, nor exempt its bequests from legacy duty. Probate has always been deemed conclusive as to the testamentary character of the instrument, though not of its validity. The third chapter, which relates to the personal disabilities of testators, is not intimately connected with the scientific exposition of the nature of testamentary instruments, and involves merely questions of status. The fourth chapter informs us that what may be inherited may be devised, and details the testamentary powers conferred by the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, over rights of entry or action, and after-acquired estates. When informed who cannot be devisees, we are indirectly told who can, according to the maxim "exceptio probat regulam." Corporations, with the exception of a few collegiate bodies, cannot take real estate under a will. Aliens may take, but cannot retain; and so attesting witnesses, their wives or husbands, cannot take; but it has been held that a witness to a codicil may take under the will. The execution, revocation, and republication of wills, as also the rules of construction as settled by the 1st Vict., c. 26, are treated by the present editors with a minuteness of detail which leaves nothing to be desired on these points.

The rule against perpetuities, one of the great landmarks which distinguishes the conflicting claims of private and public right, has been treated by Mr. Jarman more briefly, but not in a less masterly manner, than the same subject is illustrated in Mr. Lewis's admirable treatise. A devise for hundreds of lives in esse, and twenty-one years after, is good; a devise for twenty-one years and one day, even without any limitation as to lives, is void; but a nominal postponement of the period of vesting for a great number of years, is valid, if the limitation be substantially in its terms within the line of perpetuity; Lacklan v. Reynolds, 9 Hare 796. This appears to us to countenance Lord St. Leonards' opinion stated in his edition of "Gilbert on Uses," that the exility of the interest devised, as, for instance, an estate par autre vie, will in all cases prevent the devise of such an interest from being too remote. For, though the actual occurrence of the period of vesting within the line of perpetuity will not effectuate a limitation that was originally invalid; yet, when a testator could not by possibility contemplate an evasion of the rule—the quantity of the interest devised not requiring or admitting of such—the policy of the rule appears inapplicable to such a case. A curious statement occurs in Mr. Fearn's treatise, viz., that a limitation engrafted upon an estate tail cannot be too remote. The editors of the present work seem disposed to dispute this position. We may suppose the case of a devise to A. in tail, and if A. have no son who shall attain twenty-seven years, remainder over, as Mr. Smith, the editor of Fearn's "Contingent Remainders," p. 522, ed. 1844, puts it, and that A. dies the day after the testator, and A's son is born the next day. Here the property is tied up for twenty-seven years—a period which the law will certainly in no case allow. In Doe d. Winter v. Perratt, decided by the House of Lords, 9 Cl. & Fin. 606, it was held that a remote contingent limitation after an estate tail was valid, not because it succeeded such an estate, but because it was a contingent remainder. Thus a devise of a reversion or of an executory interest may be too remote where a devise of a remainder would not, because the former are not dependant for their vesting or failure upon the determination of the former estate, and, therefore, require an express rule to prevent them, if too remote, from taking effect. These questions are very fully treated of in the present edition. In the case of Jack v. Fetherstone, 2 Huds. & Br. 320, Busho, C. J., accurately distinguished the limitation from the event, the latter being immaterial in a question of remoteness. The statute 8 & 9 Vict., c. 106, which preserves contingent remainders from destruction in certain cases, does not affect the question of their remoteness. As a gift to a class, some members of which are beyond the line of perpetuity, invalidates the gift as to all, the editors of this treatise suggest that the vesting of personal property given in strict settlement should not be postponed until some one of the tenants in tail come of age; Broune v. Staughton, 14 Sim. 369. The vesting should be deferred only until some tenant in tail by purchase attain that age. Alternative limitations are good or not according to the event; Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 368. The cy pres rule, which in some cases gives an estate tail to the first taker of realty, and thus preserves many limitations that otherwise would be void, is, in the present edition, properly commented on in full detail as a rule peculiar to wills. In the late case of Basil v. Lester, 9 Hare 177, Sir G. Turner, V.C., held that the Thellusson Statute 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98, did not apply to a direction in a will to apply a part of the income of the testator's property in keeping up policies of insurance, which he directed to be settled, upon his children's marriage, on their wives and children. The editors of this work consider that this case involves a direct sanction of a contravention of the statute. We are of the same opinion, and think, as they do, that the case of a partnership agreement, put by Sir George Turner, is not a case in point, as such contracts, even when intended to endure for many years, may be at any time rescinded, and, therefore, cannot infringe upon either the statutory or common law period; Bateman v. Hotchkin, 10 Hov. 426. The exceptions in the statute apply to provisions for the payment of debts or portions, and to directions touching the produce of timber.

The thirteenth chapter, which relates to the admissibility of parol evidence to help the construction of devises, is one of the most important in the treatise. Such evidence is excluded in cases of wills not only by the general rule of law applicable in this respect to all written documents, but still more by the Wills Acts, which expressly invalidate parol devises. Parties claiming under defective instruments inter vivos, may have a parol variance enforced in equity. But devisees under a will cannot, even though they should be creditors of the testator, and would be aided in equity, as in the defective execution of a power by deed. Thus, neither the letters of a testator, nor the evidence of the person who drew the will, is admissible to prove a parol variance. A negative converse of the rule mentioned, however, has been established, so that a clause improperly introduced may be rejected; Re Davey, 1 Sw. & Tr. 262; 5 Jur. N. S. 252. This reminds one of the construction which the Statute of Frauds has received as to invalidating certain unwritten contracts and yet not validating any written ones which might be against equity. Parol evidence is admissible as to wills in cases of fraud, or to repel a resulting trust, and, consequently, then also to support such a trust; Palmer v. Newell, 20 Beav. 39. It can be also used to explain the circumstances in which the testator was placed at the date of his will. The present editors of the treatise before us have fully discussed the rule which asserts that parol evidence is admissible to explain latent, but not patent, ambiguities. They limit its application in all cases even of latent ambiguity to cases which require an identification of the subject or object of the disposition, and in which different gifts or devisees would equally answer the description contained in the will. But this evidence is not admissible when a distinct ground of preferring a particular object is afforded by the will; Douglas v. Fellows, Kay 114; or by the circumstances of the testator; Jeffries v. Nichell, 20 Beav. 15. If no part of the description applies to the claimant, he cannot adduce parol evidence of an intention on the part of the testator to designate him; Miller v. Francis, 8 Bing. 244. In Beaumont v. Fell, 2 P. W. 141, a legatee not corresponding either to the Christian or surname of the person mentioned in the will, and not otherwise described in it, was held entitled to the legacy. This case, however, was denied by Lord Brougham in Mostyn v. Mostyn, 5 H. of L. Cases, 168, to be law. The case of Beaumont v. Fell appears to have been decided on the ground of the names being used as nicknames. The decision is disapproved of by the editors, and, indeed, appears irreconcilable with any principles of interpretation applicable to a solemn written instrument. Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a testator considered property to be his own which did not belong to him; in other words, cases of election under wills must arise from the construction of the instrument solely; Seaman v. Woods, 24 Beav. 381. The rules as to contradictory clauses, supplying and transposing words, recitals, and enlargement of gifts by implication, are in the present edition treated of in minute detail. The judicious advice is given of limiting an estate to preserve contingent remainders not during the life of the preceding taker, but during the period of the possible continuance of the contingency.

The chapter on conditions contains an elaborate analysis of this recondite branch of law. What by the old law was construed to be a devise upon condition would now, as a general rule, be construed a devise in fee upon trust. Instead of the heir taking advantage of the breach of condition, the cestui que trust can in such cases compel an observance of the trust; Wright v. Wilkins, 9 W. R. 161, Q. B.; 1 Sug. Pow. 122, 7th edit. With regard to personal estate, the civil law, which has been in this respect adopted by courts of equity, recognises no distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent, except that if the condition be malum in se it defeats the gift in all cases. The assimilation of the law of conditions in real and personal property appears to be a desideratum. An inalienable trust for maintenance is not permitted by the law of England; In re Sanderson, 3 Jur., N. S. 809; (though it is in Scotland), except in the case of a married woman. A prohibition against alienation within a limited period is valid both as to realty and personalty; see Kiallmark v. Kiallmark, 26 L. J., Ch. 1. Although property cannot be given exempt from the operation of bankruptcy, yet the interest of the donee may be made to cease on that event. Assignees in bankruptcy are entitled to the benefit even of a trust for the maintenance of the bankrupt, notwithstanding that the trustees have a discretion as to the mode in which the fund is to be applied. The case of Tropeny v. Peyton, 10 Sim. 487, which has tended to unsettle this rule, is, rightly we think, not considered by the editors of this treatise to have been decided on sound principles. Insolvency was, unlike bankruptcy, formerly considered a voluntary alienation. Since the passing of the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 36, whereby a creditor may obtain a vesting order, insolvency appears no longer capable of being regarded as a voluntary act done by the debtor. How much the technical rules of law are suffered to conflict with the intention of tes-tators is shown by the fact that a condition in partial restraint of marriage is void, unless there be a gift over; while a like restraining clause is good if worded in the form of a limitation as distinguished from a condition; Heath v. Lewis, 2 D. M. & G. 954; West v. Kerr, 6 Ir. Jur. 141. The diversity between our laws of real and of personal property is also shown by the rule that a condition that a legatee shall not dispute a will is invalid unless there be a gift over, while a like condition binds a devisee, even if there be limitation over; Cooke v. Turner, 15 M. & W. 727. Acceptance of a conditional gift under a will estops the donee from afterwards disputing his liability to the duty imposed by the condition, Gregg v. Coates, 23 Beav. 33.

The chapter on "The rule in Shelley's case," most lucidly distinguishes those cases in which the heir in tail takes by descent from those in which he takes by purchase, as regards lapse, dower, and curtesy, and the alienation of his ancestor by an enrolled conveyance. In Doe d. Woodall v. Woodall, 3 C. B. 349, the words "heirs of the body in manner aforesaid," were held to mean children. On the whole we think that the current of modern decisions inclines to narrow the technical meaning of words, when these are in any degree inconsistent with the context. Fearn appears to have leaned too much to strictness of construction as to devisees. The words "in default of issue," reminds us of the pons asinorum of law students. The various cases which have settled the meaning of these words are noted in the treatise before us with a judicious and perspicuous method seldom attained in a work on so complicated a branch of law. The 29th section of the 1st Vict., c. 26, does not apply to cases where the words "die without issue" would previously to the Act have been held not to mean an indefinite failure of issue; Morris v. Morris, 17 Beav. 198. The effect of these words in raising cross-remainders by implication is strongly illustrated by the case of Forrest v. White-way, 3 Exch. 367. In that case estates in fee were cut down to estates tail with cross-remainders. The devise was to two sisters and their heirs and assigns for ever, but in case both should die without issue, then over. The Court of Exchequer held that the sisters were joint tenants for life, having several inheritances in tail, with cross-remainders between them in tail. Although the implication of cross-remainders is not affected by the limited meaning given to the word "issue" by the 1st Vict., c. 26, yet the whole line of limitations may by reason of that enactment be so altered as to preclude any question as to cross-remainders. This would have been the case in Forrest v. White-way if the will in that suit had been made since 1837; see Stanhope v. Gaskell, 17 Jur. 157. Cross-executory gifts cannot be implied in the case either of realty or personalty; and there is no distinction whether the prior gift be vested or contingent. Thus in the case of Buxter v. Gosh, 14 Beav. 612, the residue was bequeathed to be equally divided between A. and B., their executors, &c., absolutely for ever, and if A. and B. should neither of them be living at a particular period, then over; B. alone survived the period specified, and claimed that there was an implied gift to him of the share of A.; but Sir John Romilly, M.R., held that the event not having happened in which the gift over was to take effect, the moiety of A. had lapsed. As to the annexing personal to real estate which is devised in strict settlement, in the cases of Cox v. Sutton, 25 L. J. Ch. 845, and Lord Scarsdale v. Curzon, both decided by Sir W. P. Wood, V.C., the words "entitled in possession," and "actual," were held to show that the testator intended a suspension of the vesting of the personalty, until some tenant in tail by purchase became of age, and that the representative of the first tenant in tail who had died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, was not entitled to the personalty, which should follow the devolution of the estates in settlement.

Where the executor is devisee of real estate, even in tail, a direction to him to pay debts or legacies has been held to cast them upon the realty so devised; Cloudestley v. Felham, 1 Vern. 411. Recently it has been held that a similar direction will charge an estate devised to the executor only for life. Harris v. Watkins, Kay, pp. 438-447; Cook v. Dawson, 7 Jur. N. S. 130. Where a specific portion of personalty is subjected to certain charges, the general personalty is only subsidiary if the residue be disposed of; Newbegin v. Bell, 23 Beav. 368. The effect of the death of the object of a prior gift in the testator's lifetime upon ulterior legacies, has received some illustration in the case of Ive v. King, 16 Beav. pp. 53, 54, and the case of Domeville's Trust, 22 L. J. Ch. 947, as to the distinction between such gifts to a class and to individuals. If the posterior gift fail by lapse, the title of the heir and since the passing of the 1st Vict., c. 26, that of the residuary devisee is let in; but if the posterior gift fail in event, the first devisee holds the estate absolutely. Jackson v. Noble, 2 Keen 590; Tarbut v. Tarbut, 4 L. J. (N. S.), Ch. 129.

The reviewer of a treatise such as that of Jarman on wills has a pleasing duty to perform. The author has, according to the Horatian maxim, himself discharged all censorial functions; while in the subsequent editions we only find different degrees of excellence. The present edition contains 386 pages of new matter, comprising notices of all the more important cases which have tended to illustrate or develope testamentary law since the issuing of the second edition. It should be a source of pride to the profession to contemplate in this treatise the gifts of more than one acute mind to a most complicated branch of law, and the reduction of its varied details to a scientific order. "Jarman on Wills" has long been an oracle both for the professional man and the law student. But although indicative of a master hand, it is, nevertheless, a treatise not so well adapted for the discipline of the law student, as "Ferne on Contingent Remainders," or "Lewis on Perpetuity." These works, however, develope only a single and very definite branch of law, and they therefore afford more scope for purely deductive reasoning, and greater facilities for forming a legal mind, than could well be furnished by a treatise such as the subject of this review, which has to investigate not only principles of testamentary construction, but also the incidental questions of personal capacity, and the marshalling and administration of assets. This treatise will prove of especial value to the practitioner, by whom it leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Allnutt recommends in his book on Wills, p. 16, that instructions for wills should be duly executed by the testator, in order that, if necessary, they may be used instead of a formal instrument. The concise "Suggestions to persons taking instructions for wills" at the end of the present treatise comprise a series of simple but most valuable rules that should be strictly observed by all who discharge such important functions.

Societies and Institutions.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of the members of this Society took place on Tuesday, July 2nd, at their hall, in Chancery-lane, London. The chair was taken by William Strickland Cookson, Esq., the President.

The minutes of the last general meeting having been read, the President stated the vacancies in the council, and the following gentlemen were elected:—Mr. Joseph Maynard, President; Mr. William Sharpe, Vice-President; and Mr. Edward Savage Bailey, Mr. Alfred Bell, Mr. John Henry Bolton, Mr. John Clayton, Mr. Bartle John Laurie Frere, Mr. Henry Lake, Mr. Joseph Maynard, Mr. William Murray, M.P., Mr. John Hope Shaw, and Mr. Edward White, as members of the council. Mr. Frederic Ouvry was also elected a member of the council in lieu of Mr. John Swarbrick Gregory, deceased. The following gentlemen were elected auditors of the accounts of the Society:—Mr. Charles Rose Lucas, Mr. William Henry Domville, and Mr. George Lee Pitteson.

The annual report of the council was then read by the secretary. It stated that in obedience to the charter of incorporation and the constitution and laws of the Society, it became the duty of the council to present their report for the year 1861, to trace the progress and indicate the present position of the society, and of the profession with which it is so intimately connected, and for whose benefit it was called into existence; to advert to the subjects which have occupied the attention of the council since the last annual meeting, to show that the council have endeavoured at least, if not always successfully, to further the legitimate objects and to protect the just rights of the body whose representatives they are, and to prove that they have not been wholly undeserving of the confidence which has been reposed in them,—a confidence which was indispensable to their usefulness.

The council observed that there is abundant cause for congratulation in the retrospect of the last few years. There is satisfactory evidence of a growing conviction among the members of the Government and the Legislature, that the profession, as a body, are deserving of confidence, and are judicious and disinterested promoters of law amendment, and are qualified, by their experience and legal information to render efficient service in the correction of old abuses. There is a marked improvement in the tone of the public mind with reference to the profession; vulgar and unjust prejudices are giving way to a more enlightened estimate of their value as members of the great social community; and year by year increasing numbers of well educated gentlemen, graduates of the universities and others, are entering the ranks of the profession.

These important and satisfactory changes the council considered to be in a great degree attributable to the existence and influence of this and other kindred law societies in London and the provinces, and to the cordial manner in which those societies co-operate with each other.

In obtaining the sanction of the Legislature to the important statute of last session for the amendment of the law of attorneys, arduous and pressing efforts were required, and though the Act, when it received the royal assent, was not entirely satisfactory on some minor points, the council confidently anticipate very beneficial results from its operation.

The report, which will be hereafter published, comprised the following subjects:—1. The amendment of the law of attorneys. 2. The statutes of the last and present session. 3. The Bills now before Parliament. 4. The concentration of the courts and offices. 5. The chancery evidence commission. 6. The chancery funds commission. 7. The usages of the profession. 8. The Probate Court, and the new regulations relating to the district registrars. 9. Unqualified practitioners. 10. Cases of malpractice. 11. Privilege of the bar with reference to attorneys. 12. The general affairs of the society—the state of its funds—its library—lectures, &c.

During the past year, 86 new members had been elected, and after deducting deaths and retirements, the present number was, of town members, 1,370; of country, 432; making in all 1802.

The report of the council was approved and ordered to be entered on the minutes.

The report of the auditors on the accounts of the society was also read and approved of.

The council were, by a resolution of the meeting, authorised to convene social meetings of the members in the evening in the hall and library, to procure for exhibition works of art, to invite visitors, and defray the expense out of the funds of the society.

It was also suggested that a fund should be raised for the enlargement of the library in the departments of foreign law, classics, and general literature.

The thanks of the meeting were then presented to the president, vice-president, and council, and to the secretary.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

At a general meeting of this society, held on Monday, the 8th inst., a paper was read by Edward Zimmerman, Esq., LL.D., on the subject of INSURANCE. He stated that the precipitate withdrawal of the Bill lately brought into the House of Commons by Messrs. Sotherton Estcourt, Adderley, and Bonham Carter, to require all friendly and assurance societies to publish and distribute among members copies of their annual accounts, had been looked upon as a significant if not a suspicious fact. A large amount of capital was entrusted to the management of such companies, and the late Bill was founded on the obviously sound principle that a deposition should be furnished with some criteria for forming a judgment upon their position and prospects. The broad distinction, however, between assurance societies and joint-stock companies should not be forgotten. The present tendency was to obliterate, or at least to under-estimate that distinction. In exacting a statement of accounts, the one was entitled to greater indulgence than the other. Assurance companies undertook to indemnify depositors on the happening of certain contingencies, upon the principle established by a wide and careful comparison of statistics, that the returns of one year, or a certain number of years, would more than compensate for the disbursements of other years. All that could be fairly expected was a periodical general statement of their assets and liabilities. Sufficient length of time must be allowed for the play of circumstances. The ebb and flow of chance could not be nicely calculated, and the capital of a company might, through very legitimate trading, and without the least danger of bankruptcy, be reduced to so small a sum as to excite alarm and hasten a result which otherwise might not have occurred. On the other hand, it was against the most evident and best established principles, that a company should be allowed to trade with the capital of others without giving an account of its transactions sufficiently minute and at reasonable intervals. After criticising with much ability the clauses of the late Bill, pointing out certain ambiguities and omissions, which, in any future legislation on the subject, should be guarded against, he gave some valuable information on foreign legislation as regards friendly societies and insurance companies. He then proceeded to state as follows:—

"By the statute passed 1860, in the state commonwealth of Massachusetts, a board of insurance commissioners is appointed. These commissioners shall visit and examine any insurance company, when requested by five or more persons pecuniarily interested in such company, and also whenever the same shall deem an examination necessary.

"Upon some day in each year, designated by them, they shall calculate the value of all existing outstanding policies of life insurance. They may examine officers or other persons under oath.

"If, upon examination, they are of opinion that the company is insolvent, or that its condition is such as to render its further proceedings hazardous to the public, they shall apply to the justice of the supreme court for an injunction, and such justice may forthwith issue an injunction, and, after full hearing of the parties, dissolve or make perpetual the same."

"The Legislature in Prussia has dealt with this subject on the most extensive scale. A very minute supervision is exercised over every insurance company. After the most vigorous and rigid examination of the deed of settlement of such company, a special commissioner is appointed by the government for the constant supervision of each such company. So far this system of superintendence has been extended, that not a single fire insurance proposal can be entertained by any company without the same having previously been sanctioned by government.

"But there is only one opinion, that Government is going too far in such superintendence, and the present tendency of the Prussian Legislature is clearly to relax all these regulations.

"Only lately this subject has come under the consideration of the Prussian Home Secretary with regard to certain friendly societies, who, on the 21st June last, did express himself to the effect that, as a rule, any supervision should be restricted to the filing of an annual balance sheet, to the examination of the due administration and state of the funds generally, and especially to the proper investment of the assets; and that any further interference should take place only on distinct complaint being made. At the same time he generally expressed his views as to supervision of insurance societies in the following manner:—Although it is a high duty of government to prevent, not only fraudulent exactions, but also mismanagement arising from inexperience and carelessness, it ought not to be overlooked that any general and real endeavour to alleviate the misfortunes of human life by uniting to common action, is of the highest interest for the community at large, and the public authorities will have to well take care that such useful enterprise should not be repressed by their over zealous interference in an injurious manner.

"There is no doubt that these principles, as laid down here by the Prussian Home Secretary, will meet with general approval, and it is only to be hoped that they will be carried out with due energy in their true spirit."

This being the last general meeting of the present session, there was no discussion on the subject. But it is expected that, at an early meeting next session, it will receive the careful consideration of the society.

STAMPS ON FOREIGN BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

We extract the following from the Times City article of the 10th instant:—

The subjoined communication relates to the new peril introduced into all dealings in foreign bills of exchange by the Act which provides that the adhesive stamps required to be affixed on such bills shall be cancelled by the name and address of the first negotiator being written across them. The measure seems as if it were distinctly framed to give a means of evading payment on a quibble, and is worthy to rank with some of the other recent specimens of commercial legislation in which sound principles have been wholly disregarded, while the most tenacious ingenuity has been devoted to the creation of technical pitfalls. We have seen, for instance, the Minister of the day allowing on the one hand a Bill to pass enabling trustees to invest funds in the speculative capital of a joint-stock bank, and on the other hand refusing to pay a dividend solemnly guaranteed by the Government and voted by the House of Commons without submitting the matter to a search for flaws on the part of the law officers of the Crown. The operation of the present Act is tantamount to imposing a penalty of £5,000 for an accidental neglect on the part of any one not conversant with its provisions in cancelling a 60s. stamp, since such irregularity would give a valid plea in law for the acceptor to refuse payment. Of course, as all the principal business of the country is conducted upon honour, the general risk of any individual being found ready to take advantage of the temptation thus placed in his way by our legislators is small, but exceptions will of course arise, and it is on behalf of the dishonest classes alone that such a statute can be permitted to exist:—

"Sir,—The commercial public are much indebted to you for directing attention to the consequences of neglecting to comply with the stringent requirements of the 17th & 18th Victoria, chap. 83, in reference to the cancellation of adhesive stamps on foreign bills of exchange. A long and extensive experience enables me to say, that the practical difficulty attendant on a literal compliance with the enactment, that the 'person who shall endorse, transfer, or negotiate such bill, shall, before he shall deliver the same out of his hands, custody, or power, cancel the stamp so affixed by writing thereon his name, or the name of his firm, and the date of the day and year on which he shall so write the name,' has led to its being in many, I might I think say in most cases disregarded.

"Foreign bills are frequently sent to private parties in this country, who know nothing of this requirement nor of the amount of stamp requisite, scarcely even where to obtain the stamps if they did know. They simply endorse the bill, and send it to their banker or agent, who affixes the stamp, but who, according to the strict interpretation of the Act in question, to which you refer, is not legally qualified to cancel it. But, even when such bills are remitted direct to merchants and bankers, they are often cancelled by the date merely, or, at most, by the date and the initials of the holders. And so common has this practice become, that the payers of such bills do not examine the cancellation of the stamp, but make their payment without further inquiry, provided the amount of such stamp be correct. If the payer were to inquire into this, much delay and inconvenience must arise from the difficulty that would be found in deciding whose name ought to be used for such purpose, and those acquainted with the subject know well that there is more than sufficient inconvenience now experienced in ascertaining the correctness of endorsements, without the party paying a bill having to inquire also into the correctness of the cancellation of the stamp. The only object of the provision in question being the protection of the revenue, it would seem to be amply sufficient that the stamp on foreign bills should be cancelled by any one of the persons whose names appear upon the back of the bill, and that the initials of such person, with the date of cancellation, would fully accomplish the object.

"As the present practice is found convenient, and seems to answer the purpose of securing the due payment of the stamp duty, and as, notwithstanding this, such practice may entail in many cases on those adopting it serious annoyance and loss, it is most desirable that some steps should be taken to obtain a modification of the clause which renders the present mode of cancellation illegal.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Benchers of the Inner Temple have at length arrived at a decision in the case of Mr. Edwin James, which has been notoriously pending before them for some months past. On Thursday evening, they decided after a long investigation and many adjournments, that Mr. Edwin James should be disbarred, and the decision was ordered to be communicated to all the judges of the superior courts, both of law and equity, and the other three inns of court. We are not aware whether this communication will disclose anything more than the mere fact of the name of Mr. James being struck off the roll of the Inner Temple. It is rumoured very currently, however, that the most serious charge which the benchers had to consider was not that in respect of which Mr. James is said to have been compelled to relinquish his seat in Parliament, and the recordership of Brighton, but another, more immediately affecting his character as an advocate. But as all the proceedings have been conducted with secrecy, it is not likely that the public or the profession will ever have any opportunity of learning upon authority either the specific charges or the character of the evidence which was brought against Mr. James. It has been reported that while the proceeding was still pending, Mr. James offered, if it were allowed to drop, to give an undertaking never again to practise in England or any English colony, and that he made this offer with the view of proceeding to the United States in his character of an English barrister, and of obtaining leave to practise there, which will probably now be impossible. It has not yet been announced what the Government intend to do about his patent as Queen's Counsel. There is no instance on record, that we know of, in which one of her Majesty's Counsel has been disbarred; but there appears to be no room to doubt as to what ought to be done in such a case. It is impossible that a man who is declared unfit to remain a member of his Inn of Court should be allowed to hold professional rank and social precedence in his capacity of Queen's Counsel.

A commission to inquire into the constitution and procedure of the Irish common law and equity courts is about to be issued on the motion of Lord Clanricarde. Its main ground is that the judicial establishment in Ireland has grown out of all proportion with the work which it has to perform. If reliance can be placed upon the statistics which have been adduced, there certainly appears to be insufficient work in Ireland for twelve superior common law judges. According to Lord Clanricarde two puisne judges in England do as much as nine in Ireland. The question is one in which both suitors and solicitors are especially interested, as the most serious portion of the cost of litigation arises at present from the heavy court fees which are required to maintain expensive judicial establishments.

In the case of Clarke v. Mitchell—an appeal before the House of Lords on Wednesday last—of the two law lords present when judgment was delivered one, Lord Cranworth, was for affirming, and the other, Lord Wensleydale, was for reversing the decision of the Court below; and their lordships being equally divided in opinion, the judgment appealed from was affirmed. Thereupon some discussion took place with regard to the question of costs, on which also there was a difference between the two learned lords—Lord Wensleydale desiring to have the appeal dismissed without costs, upon the ground that there was an equal division of opinion between the judges of appeal; but Lord Cranworth considering that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, because it was usual for the costs to follow the event; and the question being put to their Lordships' House, the decision was in favour of Lord Cranworth's view on this point. This decision corresponds to that of the present Lord Chancellor, reported last week in this journal. Lord Westbury there stated that, unless in very exceptional cases, he was of opinion that costs ought to follow the event. Although this rule, if too inflexibly adhered to, may sometimes work harshly, there is no doubt that, upon the whole, it is very convenient, and tends to discourage protracted and reckless litigation.

The massacre of the innocents has commenced already. The Trade-marks Bill, after passing the House of Lords, and gaining a second reading in the House of Commons, has been shelved till next session. Mr. Milner Gibson announced on Thursday evening, that since considerable difference of opinion existed as to what the precise provisions of a Bill to prevent the forging of trade-marks should be, it was thought advisable to bring it in at the earliest moment next session and to refer it then to a select committee. It therefore stands over for the present.

The National Association for the Promotion of Social Science proposes to hold its fifth annual meeting at Dublin, from the 14th to the 21st of next month. Lord Brougham will preside. In the department of "Jurisprudence and Amendment of Law," of which the Right Hon. Joseph Napier is president and one of the Irish judges is vice-president, papers upon the following subjects will be read:—

I. The Principles of Jurisprudence and Legislation.—Province of legislation, adaptation of law to social changes, statute law of Ireland as compared with that of England.

II. The Method of Legislation.—The preparation and passing of Bills, minister of justice, judicial and legislative statistics, codification, &c.

III. The Administration of Justice.—Superior and local courts, procedure and evidence—Professional regulations.

IV. Laws relating to Property.—Mercantile law—Real property law, transfer of land, registration of title—Landed Estates Court, patent law, &c.

V. Laws relating to Persons.—The law of marriage, law of domicile, &c.

The honorary secretaries of the department are—in England, J. Napier Higgins, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, and Arthur Ryland, Esq., of Birmingham; in Ireland, D. C. Heron, Esq., Q.C., and W. D. Ferguson, Esq., LL.D. Any gentleman desirous of reading a paper at the meeting should send the same to the General Secretary, at the office of the society, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, London, or to one of the honorary secretaries of the department, on or before the 1st of August next; and the subject, the name of the author, and his address, should be written on the first page of the paper.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The reception which the proposal of the Government to retain a chief judge in bankruptcy met on Thursday night in the House of Commons renders it very unlikely that the Bill will pass this session. The amendments which were made by the Lords were very numerous, but most of them were merely obvious corrections and emendations in a draft which was never remarkable for its lucidity of arrangement or accuracy of expression. The Lords, however, made two important and radical changes in the measure. They struck out the clauses providing for the appointment of a chief judge and the constitution of a new Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy; and they also very much modified the clauses relating to the creditors' assignees, so as in effect to restore the functions of the official assignee. After a considerable delay and some disappointments, Lord Palmerston on Tuesday evening stated to the House of Commons that the Government intended to recommend the House to agree to the Lords' amendments in regard to the constitution of a new court of appeal, but that the Government was disposed to insist upon a preference of the clause relating to creditors' assignees. On Thursday, however—notwithstanding this announcement of the Premier—the Attorney-General made an elaborate speech against these amendments of the Lords, which he considered, “whether for good or for evil, materially affected the character and scope of the measure.” Although his speech was a long one, and had evidently been carefully prepared, the arguments which he adduced in favour of his motion may be fairly stated in a very small compass. First, he alleges that the present Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy is costly and dilatory, and that the Lords Justices could not be expected “to address themselves summarily to appeals in bankruptcy to the neglect of their more ordinary business.” This argument, however, as Mr. Rolt subsequently stated, proceeds upon a mere hallucination. There is no reason why an appeal to the Lords Justices should cost one shilling more than an appeal to a Chief Judge, and we believe that Sir William Atherton's estimate of £60 “as the smallest or the average expense,” is the purely conjectural statement of an advocate. At all events whatever the average expense of an appeal in Bankruptcy may be at present, it is owing either to the character of the general run of the cases or to onerous Court fees. If proceedings before the existing Court of Appeal are burdened by the latter, that is no reason why Parliament should constitute a new court for the purpose of easing suitors of this burden. It may be removed in a less expensive way than by creating a new tribunal for the purpose. No one can pretend that the proposed court would so alter the character of the business in appeals coming before it as to reduce the costs to any appreciable extent in this manner. But Sir William Atherton also objects to the present court on the ground that its proceedings are dilatory, and that it has not time to attend to appeals in bankruptcy. Both of these statements, however, are such as ought not to have been made in Parliament by a law officer of the Crown, because neither of them has any foundation in fact. Appeals in chancery and also in bankruptcy are now heard with much greater expedition than appeals are heard at common law. We believe that, as a rule, any bankruptcy appeal may be heard within two or three weeks after it is put in the paper for hearing; and throughout all the agitation which has taken place for the reform of the bankruptcy law no one ever alleged the dilatoriness of the present court of appeal as a reason for the proposed change. The Attorney-General having made the charge of delay, was of course bound to account for it; and he does so by referring to the great amount of important business, besides appeals in bankruptcy, which the Lords Justices have to attend to, and which, he says, they must neglect if they were not to postpone bankruptcy appeals. It is evident that when the Attorney-General made this statement he had taken very little trouble to acquaint himself with what he was talking about. It is matter of notoriety in the profession that for the last two or three years the chancery appellate business has been frequently at zero, that the courts of appeal have been living merely from hand to mouth, and that the Lords Justices have sometimes been enabled to attend the Privy Council for want of work at Lincoln's Inn. Everybody knows that the Rolls more than once lately has been closed, because there were no causes in the paper for hearing. Even the general public have read in all the newspapers that when the late Lord Chancellor rose at the commencement of last long vacation, there was not a single appeal then pending. Is it not then a little too bad to hear the first law officer of the Crown making such statements to the House of Commons as the ground for its rejecting an amendment of the Lords, which was adopted by their lordships on the recommendation of Lords Cranworth, Kingsdown, St. Leonards, Wensleydale, and Chelmsford, and which had no other opponent among the law lords than Lord Chancellor Campbell? The number of appeals decided in bankruptcy by the Lords Justices last year was only forty-five; but assuming it to be doubled or trebled under the proposed new jurisdiction of the county courts, we have no hesitation in saying that the present Court of Appeal will be able to do the work not only with sufficient speed, but in a manner more completely satisfactory than could be expected from a single judge.

The next argument of the Attorney-General in favour of a new appeal judge, relates to his proposed duties at chambers. The 59th clause of the Bill as it stood when it went to the House of Lords provided that the chief judge and commissioners should respectively sit at chambers for the dispatch of such part of the business of their courts as could “without detriment to the public advantage arising from the discussion of questions in open court” be heard in chambers; and by the 61st clause, any party during the proceedings before a registrar was to be at liberty to take the opinion of the judge or commissioner upon any point or matter arising in the course of such proceedings, which was to be stated by the registrar in the shape of a short certificate to the judge or commissioner, and his signature to the same was to be binding on all parties to the proceeding. The Lords in these two clauses have simply struck out the judge and not interfered with the jurisdiction intended to be conferred upon the commissioners. The Attorney-General, however, considers that the provision of the Bill enabling any party to have recourse to the chief judge for his advice would confer a great advantage both on debtors and creditors. Upon this question we have only to remark that the work done at chambers is much more suitable to a commissioner or a county court judge than to a purely appellate judge. There can be little doubt that practically the 59th clause would be a dead letter so far as it affected the chief judge; and it is not easy to imagine any case of an appeal in bankruptcy which ought not to be discussed in open court rather than in chambers. The 61st clause as it stood before amendment by the Lords was simply preposterous. Last year there were 2,820 petitions in the Insolvency Court, and 1,336 bankruptcies and petitions for private arrangements. There were also over 14,000 creditors' deeds of arrangement which, under the present Bill, must be registered in the new court. If, therefore, the chief judge had been appointed last year, every one of the parties to these 18,000 and odd causes and proceedings, would have been at liberty, as often as he pleased, while the proceedings were before the registrar, to require that officer to frame a case for the opinion of the chief judge. Sir William Atherton says that under the proposed system, not only the number of appeals, but the entire bankruptcy business of the country would be greatly increased; but still being fearful that the appellate business would be insufficient to occupy the time of the chief judge, he suggests that the applications under the 61st clause from parties desirous to have his opinion, would probably be sufficient to prevent him from having an unreasonable amount of leisure. But we cannot help thinking that if the clause is not in practice made altogether nugatory, so far as it affected the chief judge (which would undoubtedly be the case), he would not only have no leisure on his hands, but would have no time to attend to his proper business of hearing appeals. But, in truth, this specious and new-fangled notion of every party to a cause being at liberty to rush into the chambers of every judge for extempore advice and assistance, has been found practically to be a "delusion, a mockery, and a snare." It has proved utterly abortive in the Court of Chancery, and so it would in the Court of Bankruptcy. It proceeds altogether upon a misconception of the proper functions of the judge, and of the relation between him and suitors. It is an attempt to introduce into England the practice of Utopia. Sir Thomas More tells us, Utopienses causidicos excludunt . . . robus ut suam quisque causam agat, eamque referat judici quam narraturus fuerat patrono; sic minus ambagum, et veritas facilius elicietur. We admit that old Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," argues in favour of the same rule; for he would have "every man, if it were possible, to plead his own cause, to tell that tale to the judge which he doth to his advocate, as at Fez in Africk, Bantam, Aleppo, Raguse, suam quisque causam dicere tenetur;" and M. Ubicini, in his book on Turkey, tells us that even at the present day the Government of that country provides lawyers who are bound, for a fee of about twopence-halfpenny of our money, to answer any case that is presented to them. But notwithstanding the strong efforts which have recently been made to introduce the same system into this country, and the establishment of a number of law agencies in the district probate registries throughout the provinces, we expect upon the whole it will be found somewhat impracticable and very unsuitable to the notions and habits of Englishmen. Lord St. Leonards' Property Act of two years ago enabled trustees and executors to obtain at chambers in a summary manner, upon a written statement, not only the opinion of a chancery judge, but also his advice or direction on any question respecting the management or administration of the trust property. This was considered at the time a great boon by some short-sighted would-be law reformers; but all lawyers of any experience in such matters knew well enough that, practically, this specious enactment must be a dead letter. Its only effect could be, on the one hand to convert the chancery judges into universal and perfunctory law advisers of all the trustees and executors in the country; or, on the other, to make them discourage parties from coming before them, except after previous advice and consideration, and with cases framed not only to elicit, but to be a record of, the judge's opinion when obtained. Nor is there any ground whatever for supposing that if— notwithstanding the opinion of the House of Lords—a new Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy shall be constituted, the 59th clause which affects to enable everyone of at least 100,000 persons to require the opinion of the chief judge upon every "point" or "matter" arising in the course of the proceedings in which they are interested, will not prove itself to be wholly inoperative and delusive.

The other points touched upon by the Attorney-General related to the criminal jurisdiction of the new court, and the power of the judge to try issues of fact before himself and a jury. As to these points it may be remarked that modern experience has shown, especially in county courts, how rarely the intervention of a jury is sought when it depends upon the option either of the parties or of a judge. But if juries are so very important in some bankruptcy questions, why should not their aid be invoked for the Lords Justices as well as for the new chief judge? and why should not the present Court of Appeal have as much power as the proposed one to punish bankrupts? We altogether agree with those speakers in the debate of Thursday night who considered the new judge as a mere excrescence upon the pending measure, and as involving a large and useless expense. Mr. Bovill well likened the present proceeding to Lord Brougham's project of 1831, which inflicted upon the country a Superior Court of Bankruptcy, originally consisting of four judges, of whom three became pensioned off, leaving a single Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, who was finally abolished from sheer want of business. The lesson which the country was then taught ought not to be yet forgotten; and although a majority of the House of Commons has refused to adopt the amendment suggested by the House of Lords on the united recommendation of nearly every one of their great lawyers, we hope the country may be saved the expense, and the profession the scandal of a new tribunal for which no occasion really exists, and which must necessarily be idle more than half its time.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. VII.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

Nature of a Trade Mark in Literary Property not the Subject of Copyright.

We have now to consider those cases in which the use of a particular title or title-page to a book or the use of an author's name, has been restrained by injunction. For such cases, although they can hardly be classed under the strict head of trade-marks, are yet so far similar, that we find the same principles brought to bear in the decisions on them as are laid down in cases of trading.

The first of these cases is Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 215, where the plaintiff was proprietor of a monthly magazine published by the defendant, and sold at his shop upon commission. This publication continued during five months, but at the end of that time disputes arose between the parties; it was agreed to discontinue the joint publication, and a final settlement of accounts was had. The plaintiff then circulated advertisements stating that the publication under its old title would be continued by him, and that a sixth number of the magazine would be, as it accordingly was, shortly afterwards published by him. The defendants at once advertised and published the first number of a periodical work under a title similar to the plaintiff's, but described as a "New Series Improved." The injunction applied for was to restrain them from selling any copies of their publication, and from printing or publishing any future or other number either under the same or any similar appellation, and from borrowing and using the title and appellation or copying the ornaments or any part of the plaintiff's original publication. Several circumstances were alleged by the bill to show that the defendant's work was intended to mislead the public to the conclusion that it was a continuation of the plaintiff's; such as the general resemblance, though not an exact similarity of its title-page and wrapper, the continuation in the new magazine of an article left unfinished by the old, and the publication of an index to the first five numbers of the old work, under the name of an index to the first part. This intention was, however, denied by the defendant's answer, which attempted to give a sufficient reason for the steps which he had taken in composing the form and substance of the new magazine, to show that it was not intended by him to represent it to the public as a continuation of the old work, and he submitted that he had a right to publish a work under a similar title. The Court, however, held that upon the facts stated, there appeared to be an intention on the part of the defendant to put his work before the world as a continuation of the old magazine. Lord Eldon there did not rest his decision so much on the ground of copyright or of contract, but relied principally upon that of fraud. After referring to other cases as having been generally where, under colour of a new work, an old work has been republished, and copies multiplied, he proceeds to consider whether the same principles may not be applied to the case before him, and goes on to say,—“In this case, while protesting against the argument, that a man is not at liberty to do anything which can affect the sale of another work of this kind, and that, because the sale is affected, therefore there is an injury (for if there is a fair competition by another original work, really new, be the loss what it may, there is no damage or injury), I shall state the question to be not whether this work is the same; but, in a question between these parties, whether the defendant has not represented it to be the same, and whether the injury to the plaintiff is not as great and the loss accruing ought not to be regarded in equity upon the same principles between them as if it was in fact the same work.” What we may gather from this decision amounts to this, that by a certain resemblance of form and matter a publisher may put forth to the public a literary work so as to be taken for another work of established reputation, so that the advantage in the market enjoyed by the original work is fraudulently obtained by the copy; and that this advantage in the market corresponds in some measure with the property created by the Copyright Act, and will be protected by the Court on analogous grounds.

The case of Spottiswoode v. Clarke, 2 Ph. 154, is of a similar character. There an application to discharge an order of the Vice-Chancellor was granted because the Court was not satisfied that it was a case in which the plaintiff had a legal right against the defendant, so as to justify it in restraining the latter from the sale of his work until the legal right had been established in the proper tribunal. The injunction had been granted to restrain the defendant from selling or exposing for sale any almanacks bound in wrappers or covers with the title “Pictorial Almanack” printed thereon, so as, by colourable representation or otherwise, to represent the almanack published and sold by the defendant to be the same as the almanack printed and sold by the plaintiff for the coming year, with a direction that the plaintiff should forthwith bring an action against the defendant for the alleged colourable imitation of his wrapper. I have (sup. p. 540) quoted some of the remarks of Lord Cottenham on this case, showing that the difficulty felt by him was, as to the question whether the legal title of the plaintiff was so clear as to make the interference of a court of equity by injunction the most reasonable course. The following remarks of his lordship are, however, worthy of notice:—“In the course of argument, cases of trade-marks were referred to; but trade-marks have nothing to do with this case. Take a piece of steel; the mark of the manufacturer from whom it comes is the only indication to the eye of the customer of the quality of the article; so it is of blacking, or any other article of manufacture, the particular quality of which is not discernible by the eye. But these cases are quite different from the present case, in which, if you are deceived at all, it is not by the eye; the size, the colour, the engravings, are all different in the two works, so that no one who sees the two could mistake the one for the other.” In this last remark, I imagine, lies the whole gist of the question; where the alleged imitation is such that a person cannot detect the difference between two works without a critical examination of the style and title of each; perhaps even where a casual observer would probably be induced to purchase the imitation in the place of the original, then the principle laid down in cases of trade-marks is applicable, and the use of a particular name, title, or wrapper will be restrained.

There is a remarkable case of Lord Byron v. Johnston, 2 Mer. 29, the principle of which, it seems to me, to be somewhat difficult to reconcile with the decision in Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112. In the former case the defendant, a publisher, advertised for sale certain poems which he represented by the advertisement to be the work of Lord Byron, on whose behalf a bill was (during his lordship's absence abroad) filed to restrain the publication under the title described in the advertisement. There appears to have been some doubt at the time of original application whether or not the poems were Lord Byron's, but when the defendant at the hearing declined to swear as to his belief that the poem in question was actually the work of Lord Byron, the Court granted the motion for an injunction until answer or further order. Now, is not this something like recognising a proprietary right in a mere name? At any rate, it goes so far as to grant relief against damage arising from the use of a particular name in conjunction with a particular article offered for sale; it being impossible for the purchaser to ascertain on inspection the truth or falsehood of the representation on the faith of which he buys the article. In Clark v. Freeman, as I have before remarked (sup. p. 487) it was held that Sir J. Clark had no property in his name such as would be liable to damage from the unauthorized use of it by the defendant, as a puff to recommend his consumption pills. The only distinction, therefore, which I can draw between the two cases, that in the former the author must be held to have a species of property in his name, consisting in the recommendation to the public, which the use of that name gives to the sale of a literary work; if Sir J. Clark had been in the habit of selling medicines, or of deriving a profit from the sale of medicines, it might have been argued that by the piracy of his name, his trade had suffered injury; but the Court would not recognise an injury done to his reputation, which it treated as an illusory damage; it must, therefore, have held in the former case that the author has a species of interest in his name quite similar to that of a trader in his name or mark affixed to the articles of his manufacture.

From the general considerations, therefore, brought forward in these cases of literary works, I think we may fairly conclude that an author or publisher has, either in the title of his work, or in the application of his name to that work, or in the particular external marks which distinguish it, just such a species of property as a trader has in his trade-mark, and may equally claim the protection of a Court of Equity against such a use or such an imitation of that name or mark as is likely, in the opinion of the Court, to be a cause of damage to him in respect of that property.

SUMMER ASSIZES.

HOME CIRCUIT.—CHELMSFORD.

July 15.—The commission for the county of Essex was opened in this town to-day by Mr. Justice Williams and Mr. Justice Blackburn. Eleven causes were entered for trial, two of them being special jury causes.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—LEICESTER.

July 13.—The commission was opened in this town to-day by Mr. Justice Willes. There were only two causes set down for trial.

NOTTINGHAM.

July 17.—The Lord Chief Baron opened the commission in this town to-day.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.—BEDFORD.

July 15.—The commission was opened in this town to-day by Mr. Justice Wightman.

SOUTH WALES CIRCUIT.—HAVERFORDWEST.

July 11.—Mr. Justice Crompton opened the commission here on this day. There was not a single cause entered for trial.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

At the close of their duties on the 15th instant the grand jury handed to the judge the following protest:—"The grand jury cannot separate without expressing their opinion that no necessity appears to them to exist for the continuance of the duties of the grand jury, all the cases laid before them at this session having already been fully investigated by a stipendiary magistrate, and which preliminary inquiry appears to them all sufficient (checked as the absoluteness of the power is by the press) to preserve a prisoner from being unduly or unfairly placed on his trial, without the intervention of a grand jury, the machinery of which seems to be useless for the purpose of justice, and alike troublesome and expensive to prosecutors, witnesses, and jurymen."

On Thursday evening, at a parliament held, after many adjournments, Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., was disbarred by the benchers of the Inner Temple, and that fact was ordered to be communicated to all the judges of law and equity, and the other three inns of court.

Mr. William Thrush Jefferson, Northallerton, Yorkshire, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the North Riding of the county of York.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN IRELAND.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE rose to move an address to the Crown for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the constitution, practice, and procedure of the common law and equity courts in Ireland. He complained that the reform of the practice and procedure of the English courts had not been extended to the Irish courts. The result was not only a great waste of money and time to suitors in Ireland, but an extravagant expenditure of public funds, for the judicial establishment was overgrown, and out of all proportion to the work it had to perform. The value of property assessed to the income-tax in England exceeded £246,000,000. The value of property so assessed in Ireland, where the population was, he believed, about 7,000,000, was only £22,000,000. He wished to call particular attention to the fact of the existence of three masters, performing judicial duties, when those offices had been practically abolished in England. How extravagant the staff of equity judges in Ireland was appeared by a comparison of the business of those courts with the business of the equity courts in England. The total amount of money paid out of the English Court of Chancery in 1859, was £14,185,035. The amount paid out of the Irish Court of Chancery was £1,145,000, or about one-fourteenth. The cash, stocks, and securities, held by the Court of Chancery in England amounted in October, 1858, to nearly £53,000,000. The cash, stocks, and securities, held by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, amounted on the 1st of January last to nearly £4,000,000. The amount of business in the Irish court was infinitely inferior to that of the English court, and yet the cost of administering property in the English Court of Chancery was little more than one-third that of the Irish court. The expenses of the common law courts had increased in proportion as the business had decreased. The staff was larger than necessary, for, while there were only 15 common law judges in England, there were 12 in Ireland. These 12 might safely be reduced to 9, and instead of six circuits, four circuits would be quite sufficient. As far as he could make out, two puisne judges in England did as much work as nine puisne judges in Ireland. In England the number of orders made in chambers in 1859 was 44,970, of which 41,325 were made without the attendance of counsel, the number of chamber orders made in Ireland in 1860 were 1,782, of which a few more than 100 only were made without the attendance of counsel. In 1851 the number of judgment cases entered in the three law courts in Ireland was 7,229, at a cost to the public in salaries and emoluments of £17,759, while in 1859 the number of cases and judgments entered had dwindled to 3,421, and the expense had risen to £22,399. The only objection which he could conceive to the motion was that it would be unpopular with the profession in Ireland, as it would diminish the number of places; for there could be no doubt that the effect of new regulations in the law courts would be to diminish the amount of public money expended on the staff of these courts, and the number of fees uselessly paid. He did not believe that any Irish lawyer worthy of his profession would take such an objection. His object was to raise the Irish bar. He moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty would be graciously pleased to issue a royal commission to inquire into the constitution, establishment, practice, procedure, and fees, of the superior courts of common law in Ireland; and the differences between the constitution and the forms of practice, procedure, and fees of the Courts of Chancery of England and of Ireland.

Lord WENSLEYDALE supported the motion.

Earl GRANVILLE admitted that a clear case had been made out for inquiry in this matter, and he, therefore, on the part of the Government, would make no opposition to the motion.

Lord BROUGHAM said that nothing could be more necessary than the issuing of this commission, but there was one part of the subject which required an inquiry, he meant the subject of judicial statistics. Whether the laws and the practice of the two countries required assimilation might demand investigation, and in all possibility legislative interference, but a system of judicial statistics ought to be extended to Ireland, as it had been to Scotland and to England.

After a few words from the Marquis of CLANRICARDE in reply,

The motion was agreed to.

EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Lord BROUGHAM, in presenting a petition from Mr. Blundell on this subject, said he had always desired to extend to criminal trials the great improvements which had been introduced with regard to civil actions, in which the examination of the defendant was not only permitted, but in some instances had now been rendered compulsory. He would not make it imperative upon the accused to give evidence, but he would permit him to do so in case he thought proper; and the fact that the defendant either did or did not submit himself to cross examination was fairly entitled, in his opinion, to weight with the jury. The facts disclosed in the petition which he had presented strongly illustrated the necessity for such a change in the law. Mr. Blundell, in his endeavours to improve the administration of the county court, became involved in a correspondence which, it was alleged, partook of a libellous tendency. Proceedings were taken against him, and Mr. Blundell offered to deposit £100, to cover the costs of his adversary, if he would allow the action to be brought in a shape which would admit of his being examined. That proposition, however, was declined, and an indictment was brought against him not only for libel, but for an attempt to extort money. The latter part of the case broke down, and an acquittal was directed; but the charge of libel was persevered in, and as Mr. Blundell was unable to be heard in his own defence, he was convicted. His only remedy, as he was advised, was to prosecute his opponent, who would in turn be debarred from giving evidence in his own behalf. Mr. Blundell complained of this state of the law of libel, and asked that defendants might be heard in their own behalf. For his own part, he would be prepared to go further, and to extend the principle to all criminal cases.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, July 16.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Lord PALMERSTON: I promised to state to the House this afternoon what course we mean to pursue in regard to the Bankruptcy Bill. There are three main points in which the Lords have made amendments to that Bill. One is as to the appointment of the judge; another is the substitution of official assignees for the creditors' assignees; and the third is as to the retrospective operation of the Bill. What we mean to recommend to the House is to agree with the Lords' amendments in regard to the judge; in regard to the assignees, we must prefer the creditors' assignees. We have no proposal to make to the House in regard to the third point.

Wednesday, July 17.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATHS RELIEF BILL.

The adjourned debate on the question that the House go into committee on this Bill was resumed by Mr. DENMAN, who observed that the exact words employed in the Common Law Procedure Act had been introduced into the Bill, and that it had no other object than to carry out in criminal cases what was now the law in civil cases—to give the judge power to exempt persons from taking an oath who had a religious objection to so doing. The evils of the present system were that it oppressed tender consciences, and operated against the administration of justice; for cases occurred in which witnesses went to prison rather than give evidence on oath, and thus known criminals sometimes escaped conviction. As an illustration of the power of conscience in reference to oaths, he mentioned the case of a respectable lady who was a witness for the plaintiff in a case at the Lewes Assizes, and who was sent to prison because she refused to take the oath. So impressed was this lady that she had been the cause, though innocently, of the plaintiff losing his case, that she sent him a check for the full amount of the debt he had sued for. He hoped the House would observe that the Bill only referred to persons who had a religious objection to taking an oath.

The House then went into committee, when the clauses of the Bill were agreed to.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

The adjourned debate on this Bill was postponed until the 24th inst.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

Mr. HADFIELD asked the right hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether he intended to proceed with this Bill.

Mr. M. GIBSON replied that, as it stood, the Bill would give rise to great discussion, and it was not likely that it could be passed through the House this session. Considerable difference of opinion existed as to what the precise provisions of a Bill to prevent the forging of trade marks should be. The subject had never been referred to a select committee. It was, therefore, thought advisable that the Bill should be brought in the first thing next session, and referred to a select committee. The right hon. gentleman then moved that the order for going into committee on the Bill be read, for the purpose of being discharged.

The order was accordingly read and discharged.

HIGHWAYS BILL.

Mr. DENNIS stated that the Highways Bill had, since the 2nd of March, stood on the business paper no less than twenty-five times, and it would be a matter of great convenience to know when the Bill would really come on, for it had stood for to-morrow, but had been put off.

Sir G. LEWIS said, that the Bill now stood for Tuesday, at twelve o'clock, and he hoped to be able to bring it on then.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

On the order for considering the Lords' amendments of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the House disagree to the amendments in the preamble and other parts of the Bill which related to the appointment of a chief judge of the Court of Bankruptcy. He examined and discussed the reasons which he understood had been assigned for the rejection of the clauses creating a chief judge, and urged the great increase of business that would devolve upon the Court of Bankruptcy by the abolition of the Insolvent Debtors' Court; and that, besides the appellate jurisdiction and duties in the Court, there were duties in chambers which required a judge of that character, who, by the 67th clause, as it originally stood, was empowered to try questions of fact at once by a special jury,—a great advantage in proceedings in bankruptcy. The Court would likewise be authorized to determine differences arising under deeds of arrangement, and to exercise novel powers in criminal jurisdiction,—offences new to our commercial code being introduced into the Bill—which were not entrusted to judges of a rank inferior to that which it was proposed to give to the Chief Judge of the Bankruptcy Court. In conclusion, he observed that it was impossible not to see that if the Bill passed without the judge clauses, in all probability parts of the measure that would have worked well with them would not work satisfactorily, and discredit would thus be entailed upon the Bill.

Mr. BOVILL, after remarking upon the great weight of legal authority in favour of excluding the judge clauses, and, upon the assent, tacit or expressed, to the same effect, of a large portion of the mercantile community, reminded the Attorney-General that the duties which he had elaborately detailed as appertaining to the chief justice might be performed by the Commissioners of Bankruptcy. The Bill had proposed to give £5,000 a-year to a new judge to perform a duty which up to the present time had been performed by a satisfactory tribunal; to transfer to a single judge functions now executed by the two lords justices. The Attorney-General had calculated upon an increase in the number of appeals; but was a new judge, with £5,000 a-year, to be appointed because there might be an increase in the number of appeals? If there should be an increase, what was easier than for the lords justices to have the assistance of one of the Vice-Chancellors or the Master of the Rolls? After replying to other arguments of the Attorney-General he saw no reason, he said, for dissenting from the opinion of the Lords.

Mr. COLLIER was of opinion that the House of Commons was right in providing a superior judge for the new Court of Bankruptcy.

Mr. MALINS stated the grounds upon which he thought it was not only essential that the chief judge should be retained, but that without a chief judge the measure would be worse than worthless. The present system had worked badly, and instead of being patched up, as Mr. Bovill recommended, he was of opinion it should be replaced by a new one. Unless the Bill created a good commercial court the House had been troubled in vain.

Mr. ROLT thought it would be wise to agree to the Lords' amendment, because it was most unwise to be tampering year after year with an important tribunal, making changes all but avowed not to be final but temporary, with a view to expediency, and going backwards and forwards. It would be far better, in his opinion, to continue the present system a little longer.

Mr. TURNER admitted that there existed in Manchester, as in Liverpool, a great diversity of opinion on the subject of a chief judge. He thought the appointment of a chief judge would be a great improvement, and should vote for the original proposition.

Mr. HENLEY observed that the real question was whether sufficient judicial power was now at command for the appellate jurisdiction. If it was, all agreed that it was a good and satisfactory tribunal, and if, when tried, it was found not to be able to do its work, a judge could be added; but if a judge was appointed before trial, and he was found to be unnecessary, he could not be got rid of. He believed, as well as others, that the present judicial power was sufficient.

Mr. WALPOLE said one thing was clear—that in introducing such a great alteration of the law, there should be a superintending judge; but he was bound to ask himself the question whether, this being a tentative measure, and future legislation might be necessary, was it right or not to saddle the country with a new judge, with £5,000 a-year, unless it was tolerably certain that a new judge would be required? His opinion was that this superintending control might be obtained by engrafting the jurisdiction upon the Vice-Chancellors, in order to see how the experiment worked.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL observed that the chief judge had been regarded only as a judge of appeal; but he was to have had a large amount of original jurisdiction. In the clauses relating to the discharge of bankrupts the whole commercial morality of the kingdom was confided to the chief judge, and the effect of the Lords' amendments was to throw this important function back upon the Commissioners in Bankruptcy.

Sir H. CAIRNS said he dissented from the opinion that the appeals under the Bill would increase; but, assuming that the number would be doubled, the present appellate tribunal, the Lords Justices, would be able to dispose of them without delay, there being at present no arrears.

Upon a division, the House disagreed with the Lords in their amendment of this part of the Bill, by a majority of 44, the numbers being—ayes, 173; noes, 129.

The consideration of the other amendments was postponed, the debate being adjourned until Monday.

EQUITY.

RIGHTS OF CESTUIS QUE TRUST ON FRAUD BY ONE WHO IS TRUSTEE UNDER TWO TRUSTS.

Case v. James, L. C. & LL. J., 9 W. R. 771.

In this case the plaintiff and T. were trustees of a sum of stock, which we will call a. T. was trustee for the defendants of another and rather larger sum of stock which we will call b. This sum he had applied to his own purposes. As the defendants made searching inquiry after their fund, T. resorted to the following contrivance:—He forged a deed of mortgage to himself, and persuaded the plaintiff to join with him in advancing fund a. on the security of an assignment of this fictitious mortgage. Accordingly, fund a. was transferred by the plaintiff and T. into the name of T. alone; and the mortgage was assigned by T. to the plaintiff. A few days afterwards T. invested in the same stock a small sum which with fund a. made up the amount of fund b.; and he then announced to the defendants that their fund was standing in his name upon the trusts thereof. The defendants ascertained that the fund was so standing, and placed a distringas thereupon. T. having died insolvent, the fraud practised by him was discovered, and the plaintiff, on behalf of his cestuis que trust, now claimed out of the stock standing in T.'s name the amount of fund a., insisting that to that amount the stock was earmarked, and that it never lost the character of being the trust fund of the plaintiff's cestuis que trust. The Master of the Rolls, before whom the case originally came (9 W. R. 528) treated the suit as if all the cestuis que trust as well as the trustee were plaintiffs in it, and he held that they were not entitled to any relief. He relied upon the authority of Thorndike v. Hunt, 3 De G. & J. 563; s. c. 7 W. R. 246, in which his own decision had been reversed, as strictly applicable to the case before him. In the case to which he referred a trustee of two different settlements having applied to his own use a fund subject to one of the settlements, replaced it by a fund, which, under a power of attorney from his co-trustee under the other settlement, he transferred into the names of himself and his co-trustee under the former. In a suit in respect of breaches of trust of the former settlement, the trustees of it transferred the fund thus replaced into court on a motion. It was held that this transfer was equivalent to an alienation for value without notice, and that the cestuis que trust under the other settlement could not follow the trust fund. Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in that case, said that an order had been made directing the defendants, the trustees, to transfer the fund admitted to be in their hands into court, for the purposes of the cause. Thereupon a transfer was made, and the legal title to the fund became vested in the Accountant-General, for the purposes only of the cause. In the case before him, the Master of the Rolls thought that the only difficulty arose from the circumstance that T. was sole trustee for the defendants. If another person had been associated with him, and the stock had been transferred into their joint names, there could not have been any question about the matter. But his Honour considered that what was actually done equally amounted to a disposition of the fund to a bonâ fide purchaser, without notice of the fraud committed against the plaintiff. The addition of a small sum to make up the amount of fund b., and the declaration of trust extending to the whole fund, were equivalent to a transfer into the name of a trustee for the defendants. Up to that time the plaintiff might have recovered the fund, but by the declaration of trust T. transferred it "from his own name as beneficial owner into his own name as trustee for the defendants." In answer to the argument that T. was a trustee of the fund, for the persons represented by the plaintiff, and that a trustee cannot transfer a trust fund from one set of cestuis que trust to another, his Honour observed that in the proper sense of the term T. was not a trustee of the fund for those persons, because the original trust had been discharged. The bill, therefore, was dismissed. When the case came before the full Court of Appeal, the late Lord Chancellor declined to look at it as if the cestuis que trust of fund a. as well as the trustee were plaintiffs. He said that the only parties before the Court were the plaintiff and the cestuis que trust of fund b., and he asked on which of those two parties ought the loss to fall? Clearly on the plaintiff, who confessed that he had committed a breach of trust, and not on the defendants, to whom no laches or incaution could be imputed. Therefore, without entering into the controversy between one set of cestuis que trust and the other, his Lordship thought that the bill ought to have been dismissed.

The same view was adopted by Lord Justice Knight Bruce. "It is now contended," said he, "that those who were active and correct in the assertion of their rights should lose the benefit of their regularity and diligence in favour of one who, when not inactive, was only active erroneously and mischievously." His Lordship thought the bill was properly dismissed; but he expressed no opinion whether it would have been proper to dismiss it if the cestuis que trust had been parties to it. Lord Justice Turner intimated doubt both as to the view taken by the other members of the Court, and as to that on which the Master of the Rolls had proceeded. His Lordship was not satisfied that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the suit in his character of trustee notwithstanding the breach of trust which he committed in transferring the stock. His doubt arose upon the case of Franco v. Franco, 3 Ves. 75, where the bill was by one trustee of stock against the other to compel him to replace it or give security according to his engagement, the plaintiff having joined in transferring the stock into the defendant's name, and a demurrer on the ground that the cestuis que trust were not parties was overruled. This case had been followed in two later cases by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. In one of them, May v. Selby, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 235, it was held that a trustee might file a bill against his co-trustee to recover the trust fund without making the cestuis que trust parties. In the other case, Bridget v. Hames, 1 Coll. 72, the bill was by a trustee against one of several cestuis que trust to recover the trust securities which he had got into his hands, and it was held that the other cestuis que trust were not necessary parties. It is believed that the other cases referred to by his Lordship are of less immediate application to the point in question than those of which we have above stated the effect. Upon those cases it is obvious to remark that there may be a great difference between a bill by the deluded against the deluding trustee, and a bill which seeks to throw upon innocent parties the consequences of the deluded trustee's error. The cases cited would be authorities for this, that the plaintiff might, during his fraudulent co-trustee's life, have filed a bill against him to have the fund brought back into their joint names without making the cestuis que trust parties; but they do not seem to establish that the plaintiff was entitled to have his present bill looked at exactly as if it were the bill of the cestuis que trust, which was the view taken of it by the Master of the Rolls. The equity of the defendants as against the negligent trustee, might very well be higher than as against the innocent beneficiaries, and there appears to be no sufficient reason for depriving the defendants of any legitimate defence which they might make to any bill brought against them. Upon the larger question in the case, Lord Justice Turner expressed dubiously an opinion opposite to that of the Master of the Rolls. He thought it doubtful whether the trust in the fund which we have called a. could be defeated "whilst the fund remained vested in T., and he continued to be a trustee under the testator's will." It will be observed that the Lord Justice does not say "continued a trustee of the fund," but "under the will," so that he avoids the force of the declaration of trust in favour of the defendants relied on by the Master of the Rolls. It appears that T. was, until his death, looked upon by the parties interested in what had been fund a. as their trustee jointly with the plaintiff. There is great force in the concluding observation of the Lord Justice. "I am not," said he, "as at present advised, prepared to hold that the cestuis que trust under the will were not entitled to place confidence in their trustees, or were bound to take any proceedings for securing the fund against their acts, or that any priority could be gained over them by reason of their not having taken such proceedings by such proceedings having been taken on the part of the defendants to this suit." Although the Lord Justice expressly stated that he gave no final opinion on the case, it may be expected that what he did say will encourage the filing of another bill, which will be ostensibly the bill of the beneficiaries, although, perhaps, really the bill of the trustee, and in which it will become the duty of some judge or court to decide the difficult and important question, on one side of which we have the elaborate judgment of the Master of the Rolls and on the other the doubts difficult of solution propounded by Lord Justice Turner. The case is not the less interesting because it arises upon the application of general principles of equity and not, as many cases do, out of the artificial and gratuitous ambiguities of our law.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

Benham v. Keene, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 765.

Besides the two points which we last week noticed as arising in this case, there was a third which may still, perhaps, deserve a brief consideration. The question between A., the first judgment creditor registered in the Common Pleas, and B., the first judgment creditor registered in Middlesex, was decided, as we saw, in favour of B., and it was held that notice was immaterial. Subsequently to these judgments, the debtor conveyed to C., and C. mortgaged to D. Now, assuming that D. had notice, as was alleged, of A.'s judgment, it might be contended that that judgment, although not registered in Middlesex, must prevail against D. This contention appears to be supported by the passage which we last week quoted from Sugden's "Vendors and Purchasers," 13th edit., p. 599, "a purchaser (of land in a register county) may in equity be bound by a judgment or a deed although not registered." Supposing it to have been adopted by the Court, A. would gain priority over D. But our first point last week was, that A. must be postponed to B.; and our second point was, that B.'s judgment was void as against D. for want of re-registration after five years. In this state of things, it was contended by A.'s counsel that, assuming his priority over D., he was entitled to stand in D.'s place as against B., and thus escape, to the extent of the amount of D.'s charge, the effect of the decision postponing him to B. Vice-Chancellor Wood denied that this consequence would follow, even if the preliminary claim raised by A.'s counsel were admitted; and it therefore became unnecessary to consider the admissibility of that claim. His Honour said that it was clear upon the facts that B.'s debt, which had priority to A., would exhaust the estate, and he knew no principle on which A. could claim the sum which D. was entitled to claim as against B. The argument on behalf of A., when reduced to its simplest form, stands thus:—It is true that B. ranks before A., but A. ranks before D., and D. ranks before B., and therefore A. ranks before B.—on argument which seems equally effective, whether turned one way or the other. The order of priority stated by the Vice-Chancellor was thus:—D.—B.—A.—C.

A perusal of this case and of the authorities referred to in it will introduce the student to perhaps the most bewildering maze of entanglement which English lawyers and legislators ever contrived to weave. The enacting of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and the amending and explaining Acts, while the Middlesex Registry Act was left untouched, is, we think, an unsurpassed example of skill in the art of complication.

COMMON LAW.

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA—NATURE OF

Witt v. Amis, Q. B., 9 W. R. 691.

That particular species of gift which is named by the civilians a donatio mortis causa, is said by Blackstone to arise when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers, or causes to be delivered to another, the possession of any personal goods to keep in case of his decease; upon the implied trust, nevertheless, that if the donor lives, the property thereof shall revert to himself. Other authorities show that in all cases the donation, to be effectual against the personal representatives of the donor or next of kin (for against his creditors it never prevails if the assets be otherwise deficient), there must be a delivery either of the thing itself or (if it be in action and not in possession) of the instrument by which it is secured, the personal representative of the donor being, in the latter case, bound to put the instrument in suit for the benefit of the donee (see Duffield v. Hicks, 1 Bligh N. S. 497.) In the present case, the gift in question was of a policy of assurance, and the point was whether such an instrument could be the subject of a donatio mortis causa. A case very similar was decided by the Master of the Rolls in the year 1859, in favour of the affirmative of this proposition. There some promissory notes, payable to the donor or order, and not endorsed, were given to the donee, with an injunction not to examine them till after the donor's death, who, though ill at the time, lived for three months afterwards. This was held to be a valid gift of the description under discussion, for it was observed by the Court that the beneficial interest in a bond had been already decided to be so transferable; and that there was no sound distinction to be drawn between the two classes of instruments. The Court of Queen's Bench has now decided in the same way, and therefore it may now be taken as established law that the donation before death of any security for money, which the donor intends to be complete and sufficient will be upheld against the personal representatives or next of kin, although some technicality may have been omitted; as, for an example, an actual endorsement by the donor where endorsement is required by law.

It may be worth while to remark here, that a donatio mortis causa as it is in the nature of a legacy, so (under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 7, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4) it is expressly made subject to legacy duty: and also, in reference to the delivery required to the donee, that the gift is void if, at any time before death, the possession be resumed by the original owner. See Bunn v. Markham (7 Taunt. 224).

ACTION FOR MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—REQUISITES OF THE SUMMING-UP BY THE JUDGE.

Payne v. Evans, Q. B., 9 W. R. 693.

This case is a striking illustration of the essentiality of malice, or rather of the assertion of malice by the verdict of a jury, to the successful maintenance of an action for a malicious prosecution. In summing up the case to the jury the judge must in express terms require them to give their opinion upon this point, or the trial will be set aside. It will not even suffice to put to them such questions as will raise by their answers a presumption as to the belief entertained by the jury with regard to the existence of malice. Thus, in the present case, where the defendant had caused the plaintiff (who had become insolvent immediately after receiving certain goods from the defendant) to be apprehended on a charge of obtaining them under false pretences, one of the questions put to the jury was "did the defendant really believe that he had good grounds for charging the plaintiff with obtaining the goods by false pretences?" The jury said that he did so believe—thereby pretty clearly indicating their persuasion that there was no malice on the part of the defendant. Yet the Court made an absolute rule for a new trial, and this though the rule nisi which had been granted was not for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, but a rule for the entering of the verdict for the defendant in pursuance to leave reserved at the trial. The Court, moreover, imposed on the defendant the costs of the second trial; but this probably was because (as may be collected from the report) the defendant gave credit to the plaintiff in parting with the goods in question, and did not treat him merely as an agent in the transaction—a fact which seems (notwithstanding the verdict of the jury) somewhat inconsistent with any reasonable belief that the goods had been obtained by the plaintiff on the false pretences charged—namely, that he knew a third party by whom the goods would be purchased.

PUBLIC TRUSTEES—NON-LIABILITY OF FOR NEGLIGENCE OF WORKMEN.

Holliday v. The Vestry of Shoreditch, C. P., 9 W. R. 694.

The position of persons who, as trustees or otherwise act gratuitously for the public benefit, with reference to the negligence of those employed under them, is naturally one which has been frequently discussed and which gives rise to questions of considerable interest. The general rule as to the responsibility of employers does not here obtain, by reason rather of an arbitrary interference by the law in favour of persons who fill posts of such utility, than of any legal principle. With regard, however, to the existence of an exception in their favour to the maxim respondet superior (applicable to all other cases of master and servant), there is no room to doubt; and Chief Justice Erie's judgment in the present case contains a lucid history of the course of judicial decisions on the point, the voluminous character of which may be judged of from the fact that no fewer than 18 cases were cited arguendo by the counsel of one of the parties. One of these, Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156), lays down the proposition that no action can be maintained against a man acting gratuitously for the public, for the consequence of any act which he was authorised to do, and which, so far as he is concerned, is done with due care and attention, and that such person is not answerable for the negligent execution of an order properly given; and we learn from the judgment already referred to, that this doctrine was solemnly affirmed by the House of Lords in the case of Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & Fin. 894.) The cases (and they are numerous), which at first sight seem inconsistent with this law will be found on examination to be decided against the defendants, by reason of their having (though it may be indirectly) received a profit from the public undertaking with which they were connected.

Correspondence.

IRISH ANTE-UNION STATUTES.

There occurs in the Journal, ante, p. 611, the following statement, "As English courts do not take judicial cognizance of Irish statutes passed before the Union, which must, therefore, be proved to those courts as facts, an Irish barrister deposed as to the effect of the Irish law in invalidating mixed marriages, and that the Act of George 2 was still, as regards the parties to such marriages, unrepealed." Mr. Reilly, in his letter, ante, p. 632, which comments upon this statement, quotes it as far as the word "deposed," and then assumes that the legal witness was called to prove the passing of the 19th Geo. 2, c. 13. The Act 41 Geo. 3, c. 90, to which Mr. Reilly refers, renders a copy of an Irish Act passed before the Union, printed and published by the King's printer, conclusive evidence of the passing of such Act. Further proof, therefore, of the passing of such an Act would have been unnecessary. But in the case at Warwick sessions, it was incumbent upon the appellants to prove not only the passing of the Irish Act referred to, but also the construction of that Act, and its force at the present time; in short, the present state of the Irish marriage law as regards mixed marriages by a Roman Catholic priest. If the justices then present read over the indexes of all the Irish statutes passed from the 19th Geo. 2, c. 19, down to the year of the Union, they would have seen that the last-mentioned statute was not repealed by the Irish Parliament. But this perusal would have occupied the Court a considerable time; and, even after such an examination, they would have been unaided as to the construction of that Act.

The statute to which Mr. Reilly refers merely affirmed the rule of international law, which permits foreign laws to be proved "by authenticated copies;" Story's Conflict of Laws, p. 1012. In Emmie v. Smith, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, 14 Howard, 400, Amer. Rep., a copy of the Civil Code of France, purporting to have been printed at the royal press, Paris, was held admissible as evidence of the law of France. The Act, 41 Geo. 3, therefore, involved no new principle of evidence. It would have been very different if it had enacted that English courts should take judicial cognizance of Irish statutes. When proof of an Irish statute is made by the production of a copy printed by the King's printer, (which was done at the Warwick sessions), the Court may then examine any other evidence it may choose, in order to ascertain the construction of such a statute. It is the more necessary for parties who have to prove not merely the passing of a particular Act, but the present state of the law, to produce skilled evidence when the question which is to be determined is the construction given to a foreign statute in a foreign country. It was to meet such cases that the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63, which was intended to facilitate the ascertainment of the law of one part of her Majesty's dominions by the courts of another part, and which is commented upon in your Journal, ante, p. 522, was passed. The construction given to a foreign statute in a foreign country is to be determined not by the Court but by the jury; Holman v. King, 7 Met. 384, Amer. Rep.; Story's Conflict of Laws, p. 1011; although the general rule is, as stated in the Journal, ante, p. 521, that foreign laws should be proved as facts to the court. It can hardly, therefore, be supposed that the appellants in the case at Warwick sessions erred from excess of caution in producing proper oral evidence of a matter which partakes so much of the nature of an issue in fact, or that the remarks in the Journal were deficient in necessary criticism of that case. The Provinces.

BOLTON.—At the Town-hall, Bolton, a case came on for hearing on Monday last, involving a very knotty question, as to whether a cart laden with lime, intended for agricultural purposes, is liable to pay toll. It appeared that on the 29th ult., James Bromiley, of Horwich, passed through the Lady-bridge toll-bar, near Bolton, with an empty cart, and returned laden with lime, which he said was for tillage for the land. When going through with the empty cart he paid the toll, one shilling, and on his return he expected the toll to be returned, it not being considered legal to take toll for lime when intended for the improvement of land; but the tollkeeper refused to return the money. A summons was taken out charging him with taking illegal toll.—Mr. Edge, solicitor, appeared for complainant.—Mr. Hall, for defendant, said they were entitled to charge for lime, it not being exempt, and referred to the various Acts of Parliament. By 3rd & 4th George 4, cap. 126, sec. 32, no toll was to be demanded for any cart conveying manure, soil, compost, dung, &c., (save and except lime). Difficulties afterwards arose, and 4th & 5th George 4, cap. 16, sec. 1, was passed, which stated that lime for the improvement of land should be exempt. Still greater difficulties arose, and another Act was passed, 5th & 6th William 4, cap. 18, sec. 1, enacting that, as disputes had arisen about conveying manure for the improvement of land, from the 1st January, 1836, no toll should be demanded for manure, &c., again excepting lime. By the 3rd & 4th Vict., cap. 51, sec. 1, which was intended to amend the former Acts upon the question of conveying lime, it is enacted that no toll shall be chargeable for lime when the local Act says it shall not be chargeable. And by the 13th and 14th Vict., cap. 79, lime was again made liable, notwithstanding anything said in either any local or general Act; but, in defiance of all claims by mortgagees or others upon the rent-charges of the tolls, it further provides that the trustees of the turnpike shall have power to take the toll of lime, if they think fit, leaving the power entirely in their hands; and in this case the trustees have not chosen to make lime exempt from toll, and there was nothing in the local Act for that road which related to lime, either that they should take toll or otherwise. Accordingly the magistrates decided for the defendant.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

FRANCE.—A technical decision of some interest was recently given by the Court of Cassation; it was to the effect that simple falsehood is not sufficient to constitute the "fraudulent manoeuvre" which Art. 405 of the Penal Code declares to be an essential element in swindling, but that it must be accompanied by circumstances which influence the person duped. In virtue of that definition the Court quashed a condemnation of six months' imprisonment pronounced on one Duval by the Imperial Court of Caen, for swindling, under these circumstances:—A young man who owed him money was lodged in the Debtors' Prison at Caen by another creditor; and he (Duval) went to the young man's mother and representing himself to be the detaining creditor, obtained from her a guarantee of the debt, subject to the condition of his releasing the young man. The Court decided that though what he had done was blameworthy, it was not a "fraudulent manoeuvre," within the meaning of the Penal Code.

The French law is very severe on persons who take girls under age from their parents, even when the girls themselves are perfectly willing to go. A young man named Guillard, aged 20, clerk to a huissier, at La Villette, was recently condemned by the Tribunal of Correctional Police to a year's imprisonment for having received into his lodging, and kept for three days, a girl, aged between 15 and 16, named Faure and yet it was found that not only did she go of her own accord, but that it was by advances which she made that the young man became acquainted with her.

Review.

A Treatise on Facts as Subjects of Inquiry by a Jury. By JAMES RAM, of the Inner Temple, M.A. Cambridge, Barrister-at-Law. Maxwell. 1861.

This book is called a "treatise," which has been defined to be a "written composition on a particular subject in which the principles of it are discussed or explained;" and if one looked no further into the work before us than the chapter of contents, he would probably come to the conclusion that the author had handled his subject in a manner fairly entitling him to dignify his work with so pretentious a designation. Mr. Ram commences with an introductory discourse, which at first sight looks like science, and then he devotes a number of separate chapters to such abstract topics as "perception," "impression," "memory," "recognition," "suspicion," "probability, &c.;" and, as a rule, each chapter opens with a definition or description of the principal topic under consideration. So far we do not complain that he has not sufficient seeming regard to scientific method and treatment. What we object to is, that the science of the book is confined wholly to the names of the chapters, and to the definitions and descriptions to which we have referred. For the rest, it is little more than an incongruous collection of extracts, with very slender pretensions, for the most part, to anything like skilful collation, or appositeness to the matter in hand. Some of the definitions themselves, moreover, are frequently curious specimens of logic, and are by no means likely to aid the reader in his attempt to appreciate the design of the author or to understand the question immediately before him. The introductory chapter informs us, that "subjects of jurisprudence are facts and laws;" and having made this lucid and logical averment, Mr. Ram proceeds to tell us that "facts are the source and the cause of laws. From facts proceed rights and wrongs; both requiring the government of law." These are his first utterances, and are somewhat calculated to deter criticism, for they are sufficiently scholastic in form, and dogmatic in tone. They are, nevertheless, as nonsensical as they could well be; and this we think must be apparent to Mr. Ram himself by this time, if he has taken the trouble to consider their meaning. Why facts and laws should be said to be par excellence subjects of jurisprudence, more than men and things, rights and wrongs, punishment and reformation, individuals and society, or any one of a dozen of such couples of nouns as we might string together, Mr. Ram will not find it easy to show. Indeed, until we read this introduction, we were under the impression that of all the entities or abstractions in the world, of which it could not be predicated that they were not subjects of jurisprudence, laws most certainly belonged to this category, inasmuch as they are themselves identical with jurisprudence, and we know of nothing that can be its own subject. As to the remaining term included in the predicate of the first proposition, we admit it is difficult to deny that facts are subjects of jurisprudence; but inasmuch as facts are also subjects of every other science, actual and possible, just as much as they are of jurisprudence, and as this part of the definition is, therefore, merely a truism, and utterly worthless for the author's purpose, it might as well have been omitted. It gives us no more information than Mr. Emerson did, when he informed the world that "belief consists in accepting the affirmations of the soul, unbelief in denying them." This is only a showy way of talking sheer nonsense, the matter but not the manner of which is equalled by our author in the work before us. We confess to an inability on our part to extract anything like a definite idea of what is meant by the proposition that "facts are the source and the cause of laws," especially after being told that both facts and laws are in common the subjects of jurisprudence. In one sense, facts are the source and the cause not only of laws, but of everything in the universe, except the self-existent great First Cause: but of what use it can be to propound this, as an important axiom especially applicable to the subject of jurisprudence, we are at a loss to discover. Indeed, we doubt very much whether Mr. Ram himself attached any very definite meaning to the words "source" and "cause," as they are used in this definition. Does he mean that facts are the final, the efficient, or the physical cause of laws, the id a quo, the id ex quo, or the id propter quod. We have been told by some that jurisprudence owes its origin to an original contract between men emerging from the savage state, and that it is merely the creature of society; by others, that it emanates and derives its sanctions from the moral nature of man; while a third class of teachers inform us that it is at once the creature of political society and of human reason. But if Mr. Ram's fundamental proposition be true, namely, that facts are the cause of laws, he may claim to be the founder of a new legal philosophy. However, lest we might go astray in following the logic of our author, he gives us a definition of the sense in which he uses the term "fact," which we are tempted to quote:—"By fact is here meant," says Mr. Ram, "anything that is the subject of testimony; anything that a witness rightly testifies to be a fact. If a thing be perceived by any sense of the body or faculty of the mind, the perception is a fact. If anything is seen or heard, the seeing or hearing of it is a fact. If any emotion of the mind is felt, as joy, grief, anger, the feeling of it is a fact. If the operation of the mind is productive of an effect, as intention, knowledge, skill, the possession of this effect is a fact. If any proposition be true, whatever is affirmed or denied in it is a fact. A. said this or that, or did this or that—if these propositions be true, then that A. did so say or did so do is a fact."

It will be seen from this extract that our author here gives up the only excuse which he could possibly have for his prior definition of the cause of laws; for although, as we have observed, "facts"—using the word in its absolute sense—are the cause not only of laws but of every other study, yet it is sufficiently obvious that "facts," according to Mr. Ram's use of the word, as it is so elaborately explained by himself, are neither the source nor the cause of laws except that very small part of them which prescribe rules for the admission of evidence. Mr. Ram tells us that "from facts proceed rights and wrongs," and then he goes on to say that he means nothing for a fact except a perception, or that objective phase of a fact which may be given in evidence; "a fact is . . . anything that a witness rightly testifies to be a fact"—a definition which we may be allowed to observe violates one of the first rules in logic. But we do not dwell on that; we merely ask how can it be said that rights and wrongs proceed from perceptions, or from the evidential quality of things? Again, what is the meaning of telling us "that if a proposition be true, whatever is affirmed or denied in it is a fact"? But supposing this to be something else than a silly truism, how can such a fact be the cause of laws, or in what sense do rights and wrongs proceed from it? Mr. Ram tells us that "if any emotion of the mind is felt (what emotion of the mind is not?) as joy, grief, anger, the feeling of it is a fact." But why is not the emotion itself a fact, and in what sense is the feeling of an emotion by one person the subject of testimony by another? We find, however, that our comments upon the first half page leave us little room for any observations upon the remainder of the book, as to which we can only say, that it is very pleasant reading excepting the first few lines of some of the chapters, where our author will try his hand at dialectics, in which he is by no means an adept. A good notion of the staple of the book may be obtained from the information that immediately after the extract which we have given above, comes "a tale which consists exclusively of facts." The tale is a page from Wordsworth's poem of "Lucy Gray;"—then comes a single line from the pen of our author informing us that "in Shakespeare is this example of testimony of facts," upon which we have a page and a half from "Romeo and Juliet," being for the most part the speech of the Friar, after which the youth describes how and what then happened. Our author next solemnly proceeds to add by way of comment that "a fact once in complete existence, once ended, admits of no addition no subtraction;" an apothegm which is supported by a quotation from Horace, and another from the sayings of Lady Macbeth. It is indisputable that Mr. Ram is a man of very extensive reading, and that his book is characterised both by scholarship and taste. It abounds in learned references, although they are not always very apposite to the subject. Great industry, moreover, is shown in bringing together passages from the "State Trials," and a variety of authors, as illustrations of the rules laid down in this treatise—if indeed it contains what can properly be so called. We can only add that Mr. Ram has written a very readable and amusing book, and one calculated to be of use to beginners in law,—if they have the resolution to confine their reading wholly to the extracts.

"He came with flowers to strew his lady's grave;"

THE LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

The seventeenth anniversary festival of the Law Amendment Society took place on Saturday evening, the 13th instant, at the Ship Tavern, Greenwich, the Right Hon. Lord BROUGHAM president of the society, in the chair. Amongst the company were the Attorney-General (Sir William Atherton, M.P.); Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P.; Mr. Scholfield, M.P.; Mr. Crauford, M.P.; Mr. W. H. Marsh, M.P.; Mr. Hodgkinson, M.P.; Mr. Steel, M.P.; Mr. Hadfield, M.P.; Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C. (Recorder of London); Mr. Serjeant Shee; Mr. Macqueen, Q.C.; Sir Erskine Perry; Sir Laurance Palk, &c.

The cloth having been removed, and the usual loyal and patriotic toasts given from the chair and duly honoured,

The noble PRESIDENT rose to propose the toast of the evening, and said it afforded him great satisfaction at that seventeenth annual meeting to be able to state that during the past year great and important success had attended the operations of the society, although they had sustained a severe loss in the death of the late Lord Chancellor, a warm friend of the association, and of their former secretary, Mr. James Stewart. These were irreparable losses, and he could only name them and pass on. Some very important measures of law amendment had been desired and introduced to Parliament; and if they had not yet actually passed, he saw no reason to doubt of their shortly passing and being placed on the statute book. There was the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, which had so far passed both Houses of Parliament that it only remained for the House of Commons to consider the changes, by way of amendment, that had been made in the Bill by the Lords; and it was most satisfactory to know that even if all those alterations were deemed to be erroneous and such as ought not to have been made, there would still remain enough in the Bill to merit great approval, and to occasion grievous disappointment if it should now be lost. He trusted, therefore, that the Bill would be passed in its present shape. The other great measure almost certain to pass this session was the Consolidation of the Criminal law. Four of these Bills had gone up to the Lords, and the fifth was to go on Tuesday; and, therefore, they were entitled to expect that the whole five were upon the point of becoming law. Many earnest attempts had been made during the last ten years to consolidate the criminal law. The subject had been referred to a select committee of the House of Lords, and thoroughly sifted; and Bills were prepared by learned, experienced, and skilful draftsmen. These were approved by the Upper House, and sent to the Commons, where they met with a fate which it was not very extraordinary that they should meet with in a House composed of so many and diverse members, entering upon a discussion of three or four hundred legal clauses, when there was no question of change or amendment, but only of consolidation and arrangement. Until the House of Commons should be content to accept the advice of Lord Lyndhurst, and confide in skilful and learned persons, and adopt their work with as little change as possible, no effective consolidation could be hoped for. Happily, at length, the House of Commons had most wisely and judiciously seen the propriety of adopting that course, and therefore it might be expected that the five Bills would be carried through both Houses and lay the foundation of the consolidation of the statute law, civil as well as criminal. This was a great subject, and he hoped and trusted that it would be felt to be so by the public, as well as by the members of this society. There were many other changes in progress, and some of them were in a hopeful state, while others were less so. For instance, there was the Bill of Mr. Denman sent up from the House of Commons last session for extending to criminal cases the change which had been made in the common law procedure in civil cases. The Bill passed the Lords, but with an amendment that was objected to by the Commons, and the prorogation took place before it could be considered. It was an unfortunate amendment, and he agreed with the House of Commons in the wish to reject it, because it gave as an option to the Court that which ought to be the right of the party—namely, whether a second speech was to be allowed to the defendant or not. The Bill had been brought in again this year, and he hoped it would be carried through the House of Lords, though it had been delayed in the Commons through the influence of the chairman of quarter sessions, who entertained an unwholesome fear of long speeches except from those upon the bench, especially at the latter part of the day at that critical period—the approach of the dinner hour. There was one measure which he had frequently attempted to carry, but had always failed in doing, yet without which he held that our criminal jurisprudence was extremely defective—namely, the giving to the defendant in criminal cases the same right to be examined, if he desired it, as the defendant possessed in civil cases. In civil cases the defendant must be examined whether he desired it or not, but in criminal cases it should be optional. If he chose to subject himself to a cross-examination, he should not be prevented from so doing. The consequence of his not being allowed was absurd enough. The prosecutor was, of course, always examined, and he might prejudice the case of the prisoner; but if the verdict went against him, what remedy had he? None but to prosecute his prosecutor for perjury; and then his mouth was shut, and that of the defendant in the former case was open, and it had happened over and over again that the original prisoner had convicted his prosecutor without his being able to say a word. Those who objected to the defendant in a criminal case being examined, did so on the ground that no man ought to be called upon to criminate himself; but he was not called upon to do so, but only voluntarily to expose himself to cross-examination upon the evidence which he gave. But it was said by some that if this should be the course of practice, every man who did not volunteer to be examined, would be supposed to be guilty. Well, for himself, he should not much mind if that supposition should be entertained. He trusted that those of them who lived to see another session of Parliament would witness the adoption of a measure of this kind, and of other much-needed reforms. Having adverted to the favourableness of both the late and the present Governments to the cause of Law Reform, the noble lord complimented the present Attorney-General, the Lord Chancellor, and Sir Fitzroy Kelly upon their most useful exertions in this direction. He then adverted to the defective state of the criminal law in continental countries, and to the improvements that had been effected in France of late years, and spoke of his friend M. Berryer as one of the first lights of the law in that country—a man of great diligence and extraordinary eloquence, whose powers as an advocate, and whose unsullied honesty and integrity to his clients, at all hazards to himself, were such that he could only be compared to our own illustrious Erskine, that greatest of advocates and brightest of legal luminaries. He expected that M. Berryer would pay a visit to this country at the beginning of next Michaelmas term; and might mention that he had taken the advice which he (Lord Brougham) had tendered to him, to prepare some of his most remarkable speeches for the press, for the benefit of the profession, after the manner of Erskine and Curran. He might mention that the late Lord Plunkett had also listened to his advice to the same effect, and was in the course of preparing some of his eloquent and meritorious speeches for the press, at the time of his decease, and he hoped to learn that considerable progress had been made. The noble lord concluded by giving "Prosperity to the Law Amendment Society."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed the next toast, "Lord Brougham, President of the Society," and said he felt that any one who was called upon to do honour to Lord Brougham was himself honoured in the invitation. And on no occasion since the manifestation of approval, if he might so say, of the sovereign had been extended to himself in the promotion he had recently received—had he felt prouder of that promotion than he did at that moment when it called him to the performance of this pleasing task. At the same time he must confess to a feeling of embarrassment as to the course which he ought to pursue. He felt that one could never say too much in approbation of the meritorious career of the noble and learned president; but at the same time he remembered that the noble lord had been so long under the notice of his countrymen, that his talents, his acquirements, and his great achievements, were so well known, and had rendered him so illustrious, that to say much of the noble lord personally would be to commit the fault of using the bush as an indication of where the good wine was to be found. It would certainly be superfluous, and perhaps be hardly in good taste, to refer in any detail to the achievements of his life. For much more than half a century had the noble lord been engaged in the amelioration of both the civil and the criminal law of his country. The nature and extent of his efforts were well known, and the talent involved in those efforts all must appreciate, while they hailed with gratitude the eminent success that had attended the endeavours he had made. The noble lord had enjoyed a pleasure and satisfaction which to many illustrious men before him had been denied—he had lived to witness, largely, the fruits of his own labours. He had lived to reap a harvest from the seed he had himself sown. He had lived to know what his countrymen think of him at the present time; and he could be in no mistake or doubt as to what of himself the opinion of posterity would be. He need not say that the noble lord had worked within no narrow or circumscribed area of law reform. The criminal law he had assisted to ameliorate, and the civil law he had helped to deprive of grave defects, and to put upon a footing consonant with reason and justice, so that no English lawyer needed to be ashamed. If a barbarous criminal code had been altered, so that our criminal law consisted with an enlightened judgment, and proper Christian feeling, the noble lord was entitled to say, "I did it." The civil law, also, and its administration at the present time compared most favourably with the state in which it was found in the early days of their president; and to most of the changes that had been effected, the noble lord might fairly point, as having been directly brought about by his personal interference, or mainly caused by his having well prepared the way for those by whom the improvements were actually accomplished. Having ventured so far to speak of the labours and great merits of the noble lord, he would be guilty of committing an injustice if he did not say that their noble and learned friend had not only been a great lawyer among great lawyers, but also a philosopher among philosophers, and a chief among men of letters; and above all, the towering and consummate orator of the age. To these things, at least, a word of reference should be made—to his high deserts, to the acknowledgment they have received at the hands of his countrymen, and to the success with which his efforts have been attended. He need say nothing of the long connection of the noble lord with this society, for it was mainly owing to him that it had been able to do so much, and that comparatively, so little remained for it to do. He would not further occupy the attention of the meeting, but propose the toast which he was sure would be received by all with the highest possible gratification—"Lord Brougham, President of the Society."

The toast was drunk with loud applause.

His LORDSHIP said he returned his hearty thanks for the very kind reception which had been given to the much too kind statement of his honourable and learned friend the Attorney-General, and he felt that he ought to say that one of the greatest improvements in our courts of justice relating to the examination of witnesses in civil cases, was effected in the first instance by his noble and lamented friend, Lord Denman. But further improvement was required in this department by the carrying more fully out the principle of the Act of 1851.

The RECORDER OF LONDON gave "The House of Lords and the House of Commons." It would not be difficult to point out many members of the House of Commons who take a warm interest in the improvement of the law, and there were also not a few eminent law reformers among the colleagues of the noble lord the president of this society, whom they must all rejoice to see still in possession of that vigour of mind which it seemed that he would never lose. In both Houses, measures of great value had been produced, and found general favour; and had there been a little more of joint action between the two branches of the Legislature, more of them would have doubtless passed into law. It was certainly a matter of deep regret that Law Reform Bills were not sent more speedily from one House to the other. It frequently happened that when a measure had met the approval of one House, it was not sent to the other time enough to be considered and passed. One session the Commons approve of a measure, and the next session the Lords, but each sends it to the other too late to have it passed into law. He must, therefore, rather refer to the intentions than to the acts of the Houses. He rejoiced to believe that there never was a time when so great and prevalent a desire existed to carry into effect real amendments of the law, and when so few interested motives stood in the way of the necessary reforms being effected. The society had reason to congratulate itself that its endeavours to excite public attention to the subject it had in view had not been in vain. The honourable and learned gentleman concluded by proposing the toast, which was cordially received.

Sir FITZROY KELLY said it had sometimes, though not often, fallen to his lot to return thanks on behalf of the House of Commons for a compliment like that which both Houses of Parliament had at that moment received at the hands of the present company; but this was the first time, in a pretty long public life, that he had been called upon to return thanks for the House of Lords. He might say with perfect sincerity that he was thankful we have a House of Lords. And he was thankful indeed, that his noble and learned friend, whose kindness was equal to his genius, had for so extended a period belonged, and yet belongs, to that great assembly; for he believed that in times like these, and in a great and free country like this, where loyalty and attachment to our eminent institutions exist in the minds of all classes, the House of Lords, one of the chief of our institutions, would ever be safe, would ever be respected. And he held it to be entitled to the respect which it enjoyed at the hands of the community in general. In that House the noble and learned lord occupied a high place, if indeed it might not be said that he was unrivalled by any of his compeers; while it might most certainly be said that he had done much towards making the House of Lords to be respected in the manner that it was. It was impossible for him also to return thanks for the House of Commons without remembering, and of which the company needed not to be reminded by the very eloquent and appropriate observations of his learned and worthy friend the Attorney-General, whom he, for one, might venture to say that he rejoiced to see in that office, that the noble lord the president of this society was once the most distinguished of all the members of that great assembly. They needed not the eloquent voice of the hon. Attorney-General to remind them that the noble and learned lord, who had been the great law reformer of the age, was also the chiefest of orators in that great assembly of the nation. He was himself old enough to remember the time when the noble and learned lord, who was then the leader of the great party to which he belonged brought forward in the House of Commons the great reforms which his genius had devised, and which it had been his happy fortune, in the evening of his life, to mature and bring to such successful issues. He remembered seeing his noble friend rise in so thin a House that it might have been counted out, if any wretched enemy of his country had attempted it, and in a speech of six hours develop those reforms which he conceived ought to be made in the laws of the country. It might be remarked in passing that there were some pre-eminent men then members of the House of Commons who when the illustrious speaker rose and began to address the assembly rose also to pass out of the House to dinner, but who were arrested before they could reach the threshold, and returning to their places sat listening motionless until that speech of six hours had terminated in a peroration which never could be forgotten while the records of the country should continue to exist. In that speech was laid the foundation of those vast and excellent law reforms which had since occupied the attention of the country, many of which had passed into law, but some of which had still to be struggled for. They had but little reason, however, for disappointment if they considered how many useful and comprehensive measures had become law since 1828. Because of the difficulties of the times, these great questions passed almost unheeded, but they had since sunk deeply into the minds and hearts of the people of this country. Difficulties had since existed, and all had not been done that might have been done, or, at least, that was wished by many; but all must feel and acknowledge that through the untiring exertions of the noble lord and others, statesmen in both Houses of Parliament, many great law reforms had been carried into practical effect. In fact, such extensive strides had been made towards the perfection of the law, as to lead to the belief that in the course of time their highest hopes would be accomplished. Having enumerated the various steps by which the present stage had been reached, and paying a warm tribute to the services of Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Wensleydale, and other legal lights, he pointed out some valuable assistance which had been given by the society whose anniversary they had met to celebrate. But there were still many things to do in the way of reform before it would be complete, and he looked forward to the time when there should have been effected a complete consolidation of the statute law of the realm. He should never consider his own task wholly done, or think he had succeeded in that which ought to be the great object of a Christian country, till he should have seen several reforms completely effected in the criminal law. First and foremost was the question of a criminal appeal. At present, a man's life as well as his fortune and character depended upon a single opinion without appeal. He did trust that before very long we should have some system of criminal appeal established. It had always been inconceivable to him why or how it should have arisen that in the most enlightened country in the world, he, who above all mankind, knew most of the subjects under investigation, should alone have his lips closed; and therefore he cordially agreed with the noble lord, that a person charged with a criminal offence ought not to be precluded from giving evidence, and that to permit a prisoner to give evidence on his own behalf, would be one of the greatest amendments of the law. As this was the first time for many years it had been his good fortune to attend the annual meeting of this society, and especially as it was the first time he had had the advantage of seeing the noble and learned lord in the chair, he had been tempted to expatiate upon these subjects, and in conclusion he would say that in his own efforts in the cause of law amendment, he should always be thankful to have the assistance of this society, and that he would always do his best to carry their suggestions into effect. His earnest wish was that the society might long continue to do that signal benefit to the country it had hitherto done, and be presided over for many years by the noble and learned lord.

The proceedings then terminated.

CONCLUSION OF A WILL.

We are indebted to an eminent conveyancer for the following form of attestation to a will, and for the directions and reasons for its use, which are appended:—

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand the day and year first above written (a).

(Signed)

"HUGH JONES.

"The above writing contained in this and the preceding sheets of paper having been signed by A. B., of as his last will in the presence of us present at the same time, we, without quitting his presence, do attest and subscribe the same in the presence of each other, the [5] alterations against which respectively the letter A is placed having been first made."

(a) As it is often necessary when a will has come into operation, to ascertain the date and the names of the executors, those facts should be placed first, that they may be found at once, without any turning over of the sheets composing the document.

The attestation clause should not be written in a corner, as it usually is, but across the page, and immediately under the signature of the testator, for the witnesses are to subscribe the will of which the signature of the testator is part.

It is incorrect in the attestation clause to refer to "the said testator," for the witnesses are not supposed to have any knowledge of what is contained in the will; it is sufficient if they read the clause they sign.

The form of attestation given above seems to contain in as few words as possible all the facts necessary for a due and proper execution of a will. First, it teaches that the testator has signed, and this is not unnecessary, for cases have occurred where the witnesses signed first, and then the testator, which, of course, was not a due execution. Secondly, it teaches that the witnesses were present at the same time, and that they subscribed in the presence of the testator, and also in the presence of each other; and it also provides a convenient mode of authenticating alterations instead of the testator and the witnesses placing their initials opposite to each.

REPORT OF MEETING.

BIRKENHEAD RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 13th inst., a dividend at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum was declared. This railway has been transferred to the London and North Western and Great Western Railway Companies, and the above dividend has been declared without prejudice to the right of the Birkenhead Company to receive £3 10s. per cent. from the other two companies under the agreement entered into with them, should the earnings of the Birkenhead Company be ascertained to exceed more than 2½ per cent. per annum. The exact earnings could not be stated, as the accounts had not been audited.

BANKRUPTCIES THIS YEAR.—As was to be expected, the number of bankruptcies in the first half of the current year is considerably above the average. In the Liverpool district 63 bankruptcies were gazetted; in the Manchester, 56; in the Birmingham, 130; in the Leeds, 78; in the Bristol, 43; in the Exeter, 25; in the Newcastle, 11; and in the London, 321; showing a total of 727, or at the rate of 1,454 per annum, as compared with 1,123, the average for the preceding ten years. The only district which is below the average of the previous decade is Newcastle, where the bankruptcies have diminished to the extent of 39 per cent. In the Liverpool district there has been an increase of 59 per cent.; in the Manchester an increase of 26 per cent.; in the Birmingham an increase of 34 per cent.; in the Leeds an increase of 48 per cent.; in the Bristol an increase of 26 per cent.; in the Exeter an increase of 19 per cent.; and in the London an increase of 17 per cent. The increase, taking the country generally, is 29 per cent. After all however, these statistics afford by no means a complete view of the state of the commercial world, an immense number of "private arrangements" being now made between debtors and creditors.

Every year we are reminded of the extravagant grant of compensations made when the Probate Court was reformed, by the publication of a list of the annuities paid during the twelvemonth. In 1860, after buying up 268 small allowances, they amounted to £115,987. Some of the proctors and registrars receive above £1,000 a-year for ceasing from their labours, one registrar above £3,000, and the Rev. Robert Moore £7,990 a-year. Judging from the compensation, which we believe is the largest ever granted, the work done by this rev. gentleman should have been stupendous. The salaries and expenses of the new Court of Probate in London, and of the London registry, amount to nearly £40,000 a-year, and the entire charge for the Courts of Probate in London and Dublin (including these compensations) reached £180,144 in the year 1860. The fees received in those courts amounted to £61,903, leaving a deficiency of £118,241. It seems that this may be reduced by the fees in the country district registries exceeding the salaries and expenses, but the deficiency appears to be still about £100,000 a-year, to be paid from the public purse.

SIR W. BURNETT, Director-General of the Medical

Department of the Navy, recommended BORWICK'S BAKING POWDER in preference to every other, for the use of her Majesty's Navy, because it was more wholesome—more effective—would keep longer—and was in all respects superior to every other manufactured. Pleading testimonials as to its superior excellence have also been received from the Queen's Private Baker; Dr. Hassall, Analyst to the Lancet; Captain Allen Young, of the Arctic yacht "Fox," and other scientific men. Sold everywhere in 1d., 2d., 4d., and 6d. packets; and 1s., 2s. 6d., and 5s. boxes.

When you ask for Borwick's Baking Powder, see that you get it, as complaints have been made of shopkeepers substituting worthless articles, made from inferior and inexpensive ingredients, because they are realising a larger profit by them.

ATMOSPHERIC CLOCKS, OR MERCURIAL

TIMEKEEPERS.—These ingenious and simple timekeepers are the most remarkable scientific novelties of the day. They indicate time by the gradual descent of a column of mercury, in a glass tube, which, when descended, or nearly so, the clock merely requires to be reversed. In appearance they resemble the thermometer. Prices 4s. 6d., 5s., 10s. 6d., 12s. 6d., 15s., and upwards. The Guinea Clock with Silver Dial makes an elegant present. They are adapted for all climates, never get out of repair, nor require cleaning. For India and the colonies they are very suitable. Orders, accompanied with a remittance or post-office order, payable to C. LANGSTON, Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C., will meet with prompt attention. Export orders shipped direct to any part of the world, and commissions for other goods at the same time executed on the best terms. Wholesale, Retail, and Export Depot of the Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C. Orders received for CLEGG'S PATENT VICTORIA GARDEN PUMPS, and for CLEGG'S PATENT CARRIAGE TELEGRAPH, or DRIVER'S GUIDE, which will entirely supersede the ordinary check-string.

PICTURE FRAMES.—Cheap and Good Gilt Frames

for Oil Paintings, 24 by 24, 4 inches wide, 20s. Ornamental Frames for Drawings, 14; 7 1/2, 4 s. each. The Art Union Prints, framed in a superior style, at the lowest prices. Neat gilt frames, for the Illustrated Portraits, 1s. 6d. each. Gilt Room Bordering at 4s. per yard. Oil paintings cleaned, lined, and restored; old frames re-gilt equal to new. The trade and country dealers supplied with gilt and fancy wood mouldings, print, &c. German Prints 5s. per dozen. Neat Gilt Frames, 17 by 13, with glass complete, 1s. 6d. each. CHARLES REES, Carver, Gilder, Mount Maker, and Print Seller, 36, Holborn, opposite Chancery-lane.

CURRENT TOPICS.

As the Attorney-General in a recent speech on the Bankruptcy Bill informed the House of Commons that the Court of Chancery had too much work to do to be able to attend to appeals in bankruptcy, we have taken some pains to ascertain at the close of the legal year the actual state of business at Lincoln's-inn. The time is convenient for making such an inquiry, and as the opinion of many members of the House of Commons has, no doubt, been very much influenced by what fell from Sir William Atherton in reference to this question, it is desirable that we should without delay attempt to learn what the facts really are. We have now before us the Chancery Cause List for sittings after Trinity Term, 1861. This paper contains the name of every cause ready for decision on the 20th day of June last, not only upon original hearing, but upon further consideration, and upon appeal. The result of our inquiry is to inform us that not only every appeal ready for decision on the 20th day of June, but many others that have since come into the paper, and probably every one ready for hearing, will have been disposed of before the Court of Appeal rises for the long vacation. This does not include motions and petitions on appeal, which are not set down in the list, but are generally disposed of within two or three weeks after the appeal is presented. Every cause contained in the list to which we have referred, set down before the Master of the Rolls for hearing, was decided probably on an average of a month after it was down for hearing, and of less than a fortnight after it got into the cause list. The Vice-Chancellor Stuart rose on Thursday, having got through the whole of his list. In two branches of the Court only is there any arrears, and even in them it is by no means formidable. The number of causes set down before Vice-Chancellor Wood is usually very great, and he has yet been unable to dispose of all the causes set down before him. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley's Court is certainly not famous for speed, but suitors are aware of this, and do not resort there in any considerable numbers; so that, although he has not finished his paper, very few causes remain pending before him. It is sufficiently plain from this short statement that there is no particular pressure of business in Chancery, and that when Sir William Atherton advocated the appointment of a chief judge in Bankruptcy, upon the ground that the equity judges had already more than enough to do, and could not attend to bankruptcy appeals, he relied upon an argument which is unsupported by the facts.

Very few heads of law attain to anything like a definite or consistent form until they become the subject of a treatise, and, therefore, as we have no distinct book upon the uninteresting subject of Interest, the decisions comprised under this head of law are by no means satisfactory. The case of the Attorney-General v. Kohler, decided on Wednesday last, in the House of Lords, is a striking illustration of what we here state, and is, moreover, in itself an important authority upon the point which the case determines. The original suit was against the Crown, and was for the recovery of £7,822, which, in 1813, had been received by the Crown from the estate of a person who had died intestate, and, as was supposed, leaving no next-of-kin. After many years, however, a bill was filed by certain parties, who proved that they were entitled in this character, and claimed not only the sum actually received by the Crown, but a further sum of £14,429 as interest. This was unsuccessfully resisted by the Crown in the Court below, the decision of which was affirmed by the House of Lords upon the principle that as the Crown had not kept the money to pay over to the next-of-kin on demand, but made use of it, the Crown ought to be held liable to pay interest like an ordinary person. One would have supposed that the point was sufficiently simple, and must have been decided before. It appears, however, that this is the first express decision upon the subject, and that the matter was considered by the Attorney-General to be doubtful enough to be carried to the House of Lords for decision. But it ought to be mentioned, that neither the Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, from whose judgment the appeal was brought, nor any of the law lords, entertained the least doubt that under the circumstances the claimants were entitled to full interest.

The Bill for establishing High Courts of Judicature in the three Presidencies of India is not unlikely to be passed this session. Unless its provisions are materially altered it will place at the disposal of the Government some valuable patronage, and will cause no little commotion in the overcrowded ranks of the bar. Each high court is to consist of a chief judge and as many judges (not exceeding fifteen) as her Majesty may appoint. The judges must be selected either from amongst barristers of not less than five years' standing, or from members of the covenanted civil service who have served as zillah judges or judges of small-cause courts, or certain pleaders of the sudder courts or of the new high courts; but there is a proviso that not less than one-third of the judges of each high court shall be barristers and not less than one-third shall be members of the covenanted civil service. Upon the passing of the Bill the present supreme and sudder courts are to be abolished. Each of the high courts is to exercise "all such civil, criminal, admiralty and vice-admiralty, ecclesiastical, intestate and matrimonial jurisdiction, original and appellate," as her Majesty by letters patent may direct; and subject and without prejudice to the legislative powers of the Governor-General of India in Council, each high court is to exercise all jurisdiction vested in any of the courts abolished in the same presidency. There is a clause enabling governors of presidencies to authorise judges to sit in any places by way of circuit or special commission; and every high court is enabled to provide for its exercise of jurisdiction either by single judges or by division courts constituted by two or more judges of the high court. At present there is in each of the presidencies a supreme court, presided over by English judges, whose jurisdiction is regulated by the common law of England and the statute law as it existed in 1726, so far as they are not controlled by the acts of the Legislative Council of India. In actions relating to inheritance and succession to lands, and involving questions of contract or account, &c., the Hindoo law applies where a Hindoo is defendant, and the Mahomedan law where a Mussulman is defendant. The following account of the number and description of courts in existence is taken from a paper read by Mr. W. H. Bennet before the Juridical Society in 1858:—

In the whole circuit of the Bengal Presidency, 523—consisting of 48 presided over by Englishmen, civil servants of the company; 55 by principal Sudder Aumeens, 30 by Sudr aumeens, and 390 by Mounsiffs—these three last classes of judges almost wholly natives. These Courts have a gradation of jurisdiction.

In the Madras Presidency, 160 Courts—29 presided over by English judges, or subordinate judges; 11 by principal Sudder Aumeens, 20 by Sudder Aumeens, and about 100 by Mounsiffs.

In the Bombay Presidency, about 95 Courts—8 presided over by English judges, 8 by principal Sudder Aumeens, 9 by Sudder Aumeens, and about 70 by Mounsiffs—making a gross total of 780 Courts for the administration of civil justice amongst the natives.

The Courts presided over by Mounsiffs have jurisdiction to the extent of 300 rupees, or £30 sterling; the Sudder Aumeens to the extent of 1,000 rupees, or £100 sterling. Appeals lie from these to the Zillah and City Courts, whose decisions are final.

The principal Sudder Aumeen Courts have cognisance of suits whether they originate in their own courts or are referred to them by the Zillah and City Courts, with an appeal to the Sudder Court, where the matter in dispute amounts to 5,000 rupees, or £500 sterling. The Zillah and City Courts exercise a jurisdiction to an unlimited amount from 5,000 rupees upwards, with an appeal to the Sudder Court at the several Presidencies. The courts presided over by Englishmen are assisted by native pundits or moulavies, as legal officers; and, judging from the average number of appeals from the decisions of the principal courts to the Queen in Council, it cannot be asserted that justice has not been most impartially and ably dispensed to the native litigants in India under our rule and the jurisdictions of the several Courts.

We have stated that the Bill now before Parliament is for establishing High Courts of Judicature in India. The Act will abolish only the Supreme and Sudder Courts, and, we suppose, is not intended to interfere with the jurisdiction of the lower tribunals. Lord Ellenborough, on Thursday evening, in the House of Lords, spoke at length in opposition to the measure, and proposed several amendments. He described its principle to be the amalgamation of the Sudder Court and the Supreme Court, which, he said, on account of the very different materials of which the two courts are composed, could not be satisfactory. He was especially opposed to giving to the Crown and not to the Governor-General of India the power of appointing and removing the judges, which he considered to be inconsistent with the proper functions of the Governor-General. Lord Ellenborough, moreover, was of opinion that the present condition of the Bar of England was not favourable to the immediate development of the proposed scheme, and he thought that it would be difficult to find amongst the English, Irish, and Scotch Bars a larger number of men competent to the satisfactory discharge of high judicial duties than would be sufficient to increase the number of each of the existing courts by one or two members. "Of all qualities of the mind" (said his Lordship) "perhaps the most rare is the judicial. The Bill proposes that 35 barristers shall be appointed to act as judges in India. My lords, there are not 35, nor perhaps five men, at the whole Bar of whom any one could with safety predict that they would make good judges. Success at the Bar is no proof that a man will make a good judge. Within my recollection, I have known more than one gentleman most successful at the Bar,—good, able men, and sound lawyers, who yet made extremely indifferent judges. The fact is, that the very qualities which enable a man to attain distinction at the Bar are the very qualities which unfit him for the duties of the Bench. Do you suppose that because 35 barristers of five years' standing each may be represented to you as so many Lord Mansfields, you will find ten—ay, or five of that number, possessing judicial minds? It is a gift of Providence, and most rare."

Most of our readers will agree with the observations which we have just quoted, but we are unable to ascertain how Lord Ellenborough arrives at the conclusion that there will be 35 new appointments for the Bar; for even assuming that none of the present judges of the amalgamated tribunals are appointed, only two-third of the new judges at the outside can be barristers, and, as we understand the Bill, the utmost number of judges that can be appointed under its provisions is forty-five. Lord Kingsdown did not oppose the principle of the Bill, although he had some doubt what the effect might be of introducing into the new High Courts persons who are not lawyers. He was of opinion that no fault could be found with the manner in which the Supreme Courts exercised their jurisdiction, and that an alteration in the Sudder Courts was all that was required. After the division upon Lord Ellenborough's amendment, which was lost, the Bill passed through committee, and is, no doubt, intended as a first step towards introducing throughout the entire of India one common system of jurisprudence and procedure, based as far as possible upon the precedents and models of this country.

A weekly contemporary recently published some severe strictures upon Lord Brougham for allowing the expenses connected with his new patent of peerage to be discharged out of the public purse. On last Thursday evening, in the House of Commons, this topic was the occasion of an animated discussion. Mr. Bernal Osborne objected to voting a sum of £512 for passing the patent under the Great Seal, upon the ground that the expense of patents of nobility conferred for distinguished services to the State are not paid for by the public, and that there was no reason why the case of Lord Brougham should be treated as exceptional. Other members of the House took the same view of the matter, and objected to the proposed vote. It appeared, however, from the statement of Mr. Gladstone, that there were precedents in favour of it. Four cases of this kind were mentioned; namely, those of Sir Henry Hardinge, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Lord Canning, and Lord Elphinstone, the charges of whose patents of peerage were borne by the public. Lord Palmerston spoke in terms of high eulogy of the "great and eminent services" which Lord Brougham had rendered to the country; and the result of the discussion was that upon a division of the House for a reduction of the vote, there was a majority of twenty-six against the proposition.

The Wisbeach murder case forcibly raises a question of considerable interest not only so far as relates to the theory of our law, but also as regards the public sentiment. A man charged with the wilful murder of his wife pleaded guilty, and repeated the plea after the most earnest and solemn warning by Mr. Justice Wightman, the presiding judge upon the occasion. The crime as it appeared upon the depositions admitted of no reasonable doubt, and was one of savage barbarity. In consequence of the prisoner's plea of guilty, of course no evidence was adduced, and it is impossible for the public not to participate in the regret expressed by the learned judge, and by the counsel retained by the friends of the prisoner, that he should by his plea have prevented the trial. Mr. Justice Wightman expressed the general feeling when he said that in such cases the interests of public justice are best advanced by a full and open trial; and it is certainly an important question whether in every case involving capital punishment, it would not be more satisfactory even where the prisoner pleaded guilty to have the evidence for the prosecution presented to the Court, as if no such plea had been made, and to enable the friends of the prisoner to instruct counsel to watch the case. Such a proceeding would not be by way of trial of the prisoner, but only for the satisfaction of the public, and as some guarantee that the prisoner, in pleading guilty, is not the victim of any hallucination or any morbid notions about what is required of one in his position. Last year, Lord Brougham brought in a Bill to enable persons accused of crimes to obtain a trial without pleading to the arraignment, otherwise than by expressing a desire to be tried upon the indictment. That Bill, however, did not go the length that we suggest, as it proposed still to enable prisoners to prevent the publicity of evidence by insisting upon a plea of guilty.

BARBARISM AMID CIVILIZATION.

The Northumberland-street mystery has received a natural solution. Those ardent votaries of the marvellous who hung about the Charing-cross Hospital, eager to catch the faintest murmurs of the proceedings of the court inside, have now been placed for a whole day upon a level with the entire public of the metropolis. We have, all of us, read the evidence, and probably we have all concurred in the verdict which terminated the inquiry. There ought to be a general vote of thanks to the reporters, who, in the exhausting circumstances of a crowded room, with all the windows closed to keep out the din of traffic, have described, for our information, the appearance and demeanour of the lady called Mrs. Murray, and have steadily persevered in taking notes of every word spoken both by her and by all the other important witnesses. By their means we enjoy the opportunity of learning what sort of sound is heard on the floor above when a human skull is being fractured with a pair of tongs. Perhaps one of the most curious facts proved was that the deceased, Roberts, was so much in the habit of discharging pistols in his chambers, that his upstairs neighbour had ceased to take any particular notice of the sound. We should think that even before this tragedy, the noise of pistol practice would have caused some slight sensation in the Temple or Lincoln's-inn; and it certainly does seem that Northumberland-street, Strand, where everybody confined himself to his own business, was as suitable a place as could be found in the heart of a great city for attempting to destroy life by fire-arms at noon. No doubt, many strange things are done in secluded sets of chambers. A few years ago there was a case of alleged starvation of a small servant in the Temple; but starvation, and even a good deal of cruelty besides, may be put in practice with very little noise. However, the deceased had gradually taught his neighbours to regard the sound of pistol practice with indifference; and having got so far as that it appears by no means improbable that if he had shot Major Murray dead, he might have made away with the body and removed all obvious marks of violence and blood, and might have stood as good a chance as any murderer ever did of immunity from human justice. With steadiness of aim he might have accomplished his cruel purpose undetected, although the chief station of the Metropolitan Police was almost within hearing of the shots he fired. Perhaps if another Waterloo-bridge mystery should defy solution it will not be difficult to believe that human remains might find their way into the Thames without having been carried any long distance. It was remarked at the time when that mystery occupied the police that many persons were stated to have disappeared, while traces of only one were found. The possibility of translation from broad daylight and the busy haunts of men into oblivion is proved, by what has happened to Major Murray, to be by no means visionary.

The clue to the explanation of Roberts's violence towards Major Murray was supplied by a piece of blotting paper, which showed that he had corresponded with the lady whose appearance as a witness is so carefully described by the reporters. Three letters of this lady to him and rough drafts of two of his to her were found among his papers. It appeared from the lady's letters that Roberts had sent to her a present of clothes for her baby, which had produced in her mind a transport of delight and gratitude. The principal topic in the two important letters is certainly the child and its garments; but they contain besides very warm expressions of thankfulness, if not of a more tender sentiment, towards Roberts. It is quite unnecessary to speculate upon the degree of meaning to be attached to the superlatives in which this lady deals. We may either accept her own account of the nature of her intercourse with Roberts, or we may imagine, if we please, that the happy days which she speaks of having spent with him were as real as in her estimation was the beauty of the "little gems of caps" and of the "pet" who was to wear them—we may suppose that she visited Roberts simply as a money-lender, or that her expressed wish to lay her head upon his shoulder was not merely a forcible way of stating that she was much obliged to him—whatever be the exact amount of credit which we give to this lady's story, there appears from it abundant reason why Roberts should have felt that Major Murray was in his way, and may have been tempted to get rid of him by violence. A lawless, ungovernable passion produced in Northumberland-street, Strand, in the nineteenth century, precisely the same effect as it has produced among people and in ages which are thought barbarous. There appears to have been formed by Roberts a deliberate design to invite Major Murray into his obscure chambers and to murder him. We can scarcely suppose that he began pistol practice twelve months before, in order to familiarise his neighbours with the sound of fire-arms; but it may have occurred to him that the habit in which he indulged so freely, might furnish the opportunity of destroying life without suspicion. If such a deed was to be done at all in such a place, it might probably be done with quite as much hope of secrecy at noon as at midnight. There would have been no reasonable pretext for drawing Major Murray into the chambers except during business hours, and perhaps neither London nor the country offered any spot so eligible for murder as this bill-discounter's office close to Charing-cross. The only person whose proximity seemed likely to prove inconvenient was a painter, who was at work close to Roberts's door,—and he was sent upon a curious errand to buy a linnen immediately before the tragedy began. It might be expected, as indeed it happened, that Major Murray would be seen walking with Roberts towards his chambers; but it was not likely that any person would know for certain that he had not again quitted them, or would attach so much importance to the impression that he was still there, as to found on it any suspicion that he had suffered violence. The calculation that Northumberland-street was a reasonably eligible place in which to commit murder, appears to rest on grounds which are solid, although not, at first sight, obvious. The experience of many offenders against the law has taught them that they are nowhere safer than under the very nose of the police. If Roberts was urged by an ungovernable passion to seek the life of Major Murray, he does not the less appear to have adopted prudent measures, both for the destruction of his rival, and for his own security. He seems to have shewn the cunning as well as the bloodthirstiness of a tiger.

There does not seem to be any reason to doubt that Major Murray spoke the truth unreservedly in his evidence. He stated that he was addressed by Roberts as a director of the Grosvenor Hotel Company on the pretext that a client of Roberts desired to advance money to that company. Roberts requested him to come to his office to talk about this business. He was conducted into the back room and left for a minute or two alone. "I thought it was the most extraordinary place I had ever seen—torn papers, letters, and pictures lying about—a most disreputable looking place." Roberts returned into the room and they discussed the terms of the proposed loan. Major Murray then asked for a card of the address of Roberts as the person proposing it. Roberts got up as if to look for his card, and presently Major Murray felt a slight touch in the back of his neck, and the report of a pistol followed. The Major dropped from his chair paralyzed, and before he could recover himself Roberts fired another pistol at his temple. Then the Major began a fierce struggle for his life, and struck or tried to strike Roberts with every thing of which he could make a weapon. A more savage combat was never fought, and probably a more terrible spectacle was never seen than this room full of dust and blood, where lay the mangled body of its occupant. Major Murray displayed in his escape a degree of strength and agility which is wonderful considering how he had been wounded. The amazement of London at this deadly strife in its very centre was unbounded, and at first it seemed almost impossible to frame any conjecture as to the origin of it. But inquiry has produced a simple and sufficient elucidation. The passions of men have been aroused in all ages by the same causes and have found vent in the same acts of violence. Certainly the theory of man's continued moral progress has undergone a shock by this convincing proof that barbarism co-exists with civilization. The result of the inquiry has proved the efficiency of the police, and the inquiry itself has proved that that efficiency is indispensable.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

A pamphlet* recently published contains all the leading arguments usually advanced in support of the present state of the law of evidence in criminal cases. The author states, for the purpose of refuting Mr. Taylor's deductions, the two fundamental axioms of evidence upon which he has mainly founded his thesis. These are as follows:—1st. "In all judicial investigations the object to be attained is the discovery of truth, and no species of evidence ought to be excluded which can materially aid in that discovery." 2nd. "The rules of evidence ought, so far as is practicable, to be the same in civil and in criminal proceedings." The author impugns these propositions, and also Mr. Taylor's application of them to the views maintained by him. Mr. Worsley appears to us to have overthrown Mr. Taylor's first redoubt, and to have shown that the burden of proof does not rest upon the advocates of the present system. It is a mere petitio principii to state, as he does, that the "present law of evidence in criminal cases is in direct conflict with both these axioms." The present rule of law certainly precludes garrulity on the part of the accused; but the question at issue is whether it prevents the giving of useful evidence. Mr. Worsley remarks that Mr. Taylor in his assumption, commences suit by signing judgment. The critic cites against the author of the Treatise on Evidence the powerful names of Lord Chief Justice Hale, Sir Michael Foster, Sir W. Blackstone, Serjeant Hawkins, and of Reeves, author of the "History of the Common Law," besides the more recent treatises of Starkie, Phillips, Russell, and Best. It is not likely that these authorities would have let the law, so strongly censured by Mr. Taylor, pass without comment, if they considered it to be in direct conflict with the discovery of truth. Mr. Worsley examines Mr. Taylor's criticism of the reasons usually urged in defence of the present system of criminal procedure. These reasons are, "first, that the admission of the testimony of defendants in criminal trials would mislead juries; next, that it would increase the crime of perjury; and, lastly, that it would expose the accused to unfair and oppressive examination." It must be admitted that the first reason has nothing in it. Indeed, it is surprising that it has ever been put forward; for, no statement from the accused is likely to have much weight against the oaths in the witness-box. Mr. Taylor allows some force to the second reason; and, as his opponent adds, the addition of an oath would only tend to bring the ceremony into contempt, and would not make a voluntary statement more credible than at present. As to the third reason, Mr. Taylor seems to think that he evades its force by recommending merely permissive and not compulsory examinations, except that if the accused do volunteer to testify, he should then become liable to cross-examination. It is replied that it is the innocent man who is most likely to tender himself, and thus lay a foundation for a perilous cross-examination, and that those who would decline to testify would be prejudiced in the minds of the jury. Mr. Taylor suggests that as assaults, libels, and frauds may be dealt with either civilly or criminally, there is an unfair advantage given by the present law to an accuser, who proceeds criminally; just as an advantage is gained by a prosecutor in making the witnesses of the real offender co-defendants, and thus precluding them from giving evidence. Mr. Worsley adds that the defendants can, under all circumstances, make their own statements, and that such as are acquitted may then be adduced as witnesses for the others. The device, we may add, is well known, and when observed by the jury to have been acted upon in any case in order to shut out evidence, materially damages the cause of the complainant. The objection to Mr. Taylor's recommendation which we consider conclusive, is that the legal maxim Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare already does for the prisoner what some advocates for his interrogation mean to do for him. If the facts given in the evidence for the prosecution be consistent with the prisoner's explanation of them as given under the present system, the jury are bound to acquit him; Reg. v. Crowhurst, 1 C. & K. 376. The objections against the interrogation of prisoners apply with equal force to an examination of their wives. The legal and social identity of husband and wife is not, perhaps, as likely as the personal interest of the accused to lead to perjury, or to the incrimination of others. But, at all events, such interrogations are, in our opinion, liable to a peculiar objection, as they tend to undermine that social confidence which is the germ of the more extended political sympathies and patriotic feelings of mankind.

When a failure of justice occurs, as in the case of the Road murder, we are apt to look for a remedy in a change of the law. Accordingly, since that murder occurred, the question of the judicial interrogation of prisoners has received unwonted attention. Upon the theoretic merits of the proposed change we offered some general comments, ante, vol. 4, p. 882. We cannot but feel surprised that Mr. Taylor should, for the sake of a doubtful harmony of the rules of evidence, seek to assimilate the heterogeneous elements of civil and of criminal law and procedure. When parties to civil actions depose on oath, they are only following out what their very entry upon litigation implies—viz. that they are prepared to contradict one another. No such presumption arises as to the parties or witnesses in a criminal proceeding, unless in cases where an informant expects a reward or penalty, and no one supposes that a disinterested witness will be tempted to prop up one lie, perhaps an inadvertent one, by ten additional perjuries. Moreover, a defendant in a civil case is rarely tempted to incriminate others; a defendant in a criminal proceeding is, on the contrary, always strongly tempted to do so. We had, therefore, much rather see professional efforts directed to the appointment of a public prosecutor than to effecting a change in our ancient laws of evidence in criminal proceedings.

ON THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

No. VIII.

(By EDWARD LLOYD, Esq., Barrister-at-law.)

Of injuries arising out of a breach of trust or confidence.

We have hitherto considered only those cases in which an injury has been suffered by a manufacturer or a trader, or by an author or publisher of a literary work, from the presentation to the public of something apparently the production of the original proprietor, but which is in fact a spurious imitation only, put forward by a rival in the market. There are also cases which we shall now proceed to examine, where the existence of a contract or agreement between the parties for the conduct of any business involving a secret process, and the consequent communication of such a secret, has introduced a somewhat different sort of consideration into the rules which the Court has laid down in restraining the breach of such an agreement, the divulging of the secret in trade, and generally the violation of the confidence reposed by one of the parties in the other.

The earliest of these cases, Newbury v. James, 2 Mer. 416, shows the difficulties that have been felt in dealing with questions of this sort. The plaintiff here claimed to be entitled, under the provisions of certain agreements entered into by the ancestors of himself and the defendant respectively, to the exclusive right of selling certain powders and pills well known as "James' Powders" and "Analeptic Pills," as agent to the defendants, and prayed a decree for specific performance of agreements; the pills and powders were made up by the defendants from an alleged secret recipe, and it was also sought to restrain them from communicating this recipe to any other person without the plaintiff's permission. The Court does not appear to have looked upon this secret recipe in light of property—the subject of certain agreements as to the manner of enjoyment, and as clearly liable to injury from divulcation; had this been done I cannot see that there would have been much difficulty in framing an injunction in restraint of such a contemplated injury, even though the Court might not have been able to decree the specific performance of the agreement. On this head it is observed by the Lord Chancellor that the difficulty was how to decree specific performance of the agreement. "Either it was a secret or it was none. If a secret, what means did the Court possess for enforcing its own orders? If none, there was no ground for interfering;" that "if the art and method of preparing the Analeptic Pills for which no patent had been procured were a secret, what signified an injunction, the Court possessing no means of determining on any occasion whether it had or had not been violated? The only way in which a specific performance could be effected would be by a perpetual injunction; but this would be of no avail unless a disclosure were made to enable the Court to ascertain whether it was or was not infringed;" and that it was necessary for a person coming to that court, to complain of the breach of an injunction, first to show that the injunction had been violated. The injunction was therefore dissolved.

So also in Williams v. Williams, 3 Mer. 157, where the Court granted a motion to dissolve an injunction, obtained ex parte, to restrain the communication of a similar secret. It was there said that if on a treaty with his son (the defendant) while an infant, for his becoming a partner when of age, the plaintiff had, in the confidence of a trust reposed in him, communicated to him the secret of the recipe, and given him possession of certain stock-in-trade (mentioned in the bill); and instead of acting according to his trust, the son had taken to himself the exclusive dominion over the stock-in-trade, and begun to vend various articles without permission, so far the injunction was right in compelling him either to perform or to waive the agreement. But it was said that the Court would not struggle to protect secrets in medicine of that sort; that it was different in the case of a patent, because there the patentee was a purchaser from the public, and bound to communicate his secret at the expiration of the patent. The question, however, whether a contracting party was entitled to the protection of the Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction, to decree the specific performance of agreements, by restraining a party to the contract from divulging the secret he had promised to keep, was declared to be one requiring much consideration.

This point has, however, since been settled with tolerable distinctness; in Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Ph. 52, Lord Cottenham, whilst noticing what was in the argument, alleged to be a recent dictum of the Vice-Chancellor of England, "that the Court will not prohibit the violation of a negative term in an agreement, unless it has the power of enforcing the positive part of the same agreement," says, "I cannot but think that there has been some misapprehension of the meaning of the Vice-Chancellor, as applied in this supposed rule; for in the case of Kimberley v. Jennings (6 Sim. 340), his Honour, in stating that the violation of a negative term in an agreement will not be restrained in cases in which the positive part of it cannot be enforced, exemplifies it by saying that if the agreement cannot be performed in the whole, the Court cannot perform any part of it. To this proposition so explained I entirely assent." This means only that where there is such an infirmity in an agreement that it cannot be performed in all its parts, the Court will not by injunction compel a defendant to perform the one part, it being at the same time unable to compel the plaintiff to perform reciprocally the other, namely, that which was positive in the agreement, if its aid should be appealed to by the defendant in order to procure for him the benefit of the contract or agreement.

We find, however, that in Yovatt v. Winyard, 1 J. & W. 394, the defendant, who had been employed as the plaintiff's assistant under an agreement by which he was to have a salary, and be instructed in the general knowledge of the business, but not in the secret of manufacturing the medicines sold, was restrained from divulging those recipes to which he had surreptitiously obtained access; and from making up and selling the medicines compounded from the recipes, with certain printed instructions almost literally copied from the plaintiff's. In this case the decree proceeded on the ground of trust; as it did likewise in the case of Green v. Folcham, 1 S. & S. 398, where the defendant was held to be the trustee of the secret of compounding "the golden ointment," under the trusts of a certain settlement, and was ordered to account for certain mesne profits made by him by the sale of the ointment; the Court even going so far as to direct a valuation of the secret to be made for the purpose of administering the trust property.

Again, in Tipping v. Clarke, 2 Hare 383, a case arising out of a dispute between two merchants, in the course of which the defendant in a letter to the plaintiff, stated that he had acquired a knowledge of his books and accounts, and that he intended to make a public exhibition of them, we have a recognition of the same doctrines thus stated in the second and third grounds, which Vice-Chancellor Wigram gives in his judgment, "that of breach of contract between the parties, and that which is common to all cases, that the Court interposes to prevent a positive wrong, the consequences of which cannot be adequately measured or repaired in damages." There was no doubt the question of the property in the account-books, but looking at the case with reference to the other two heads it was clear that every clerk in a merchant's office is under an implied contract to keep the secrets of his employer's business, and that the defendant's information could only be derived from some breach of such a contract; and further, that it was probable a serious injury would arise from the publication of such accounts, which could only be relieved against by injunction. The question was discussed only on exceptions to the defendant's answer, which were allowed, so that it must not be considered as laying down any final rule. The case, however, seemed to me worthy of notice, as lying so near on the boundary line of the subject under consideration.

Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare 241, is, I think, the latest case which we need consider under this head. It appeared that the plaintiff and defendant had for some years carried on in partnership the business of making and selling "Morison's Universal Medicine." On the dissolution of the partnership, the defendant, who must under the circumstances stated be considered to have retired from the business, set up for himself, and made and sold the original medicine under its former name as prepared by him. It appears that the plaintiff, in praying for an injunction, did not omit to put forward the ground of fraud or misuse of his labels and trade-marks by the defendant; he, however, relied on this only in aid of the principal head—that of breach of faith and contract; and it is on this ground that the decision rests. The Vice-Chancellor, noticing the cases which I have here cited, as also Abernethy v. Hutchinson, 3 L. J. Ch. 209, and P. Albert v. Strange, 1 Mac. & G. 25, to which I shall allude hereafter, says "That the Court has exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature does not, I think, admit of any question. Different grounds have indeed been assigned for the exercise of that jurisdiction. In some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract; and in others again it has been treated as founded on trust or confidence—meaning, as I conceive, that the Court fastens the obligation on the conscience of the party, and enforces it against him in the same manner as it enforces against a party to whom a benefit is given, the obligation of performing a promise on the faith of which the benefit has been conferred." The Vice-Chancellor here recognises the ground of property, a ground which brings all these cases under the same general head as those of trade-marks; and it is worthy of remark that while he seems to consider this as only a subsidiary ground for the decree, he limits the operation of that decree to restrain only a given use on the part of the defendant of the name and marks of the plaintiff, and from using the secret in compounding the medicine, not the general use of the name of Morison in the manufacture or sale of any medicine; nor does the injunction restrain the defendant from communicating the secret. This, I confess, seems to me very much like the recognition of the same species of compound property in the secret recipe, sold under a certain name as exists, in my opinion, in the case of the trade-marks; and I cannot but remark that there seems to be traceable in the decisions on this head, as on the other, the same progress, from a refusal to recognise any such sort of property, and a determination to found the relief granted on any other head, to the opinions and principles laid down in Morison v. Moat, and in Millington v. Fox, and Welch v. Knott.

The conclusion to which I have thus arrived appears to me to be confirmed by the expressions of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce in the case of Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & S. 652; and the observations of the Lord Chancellor on the same case on appeal (vide sup.). The former of these learned judges pursues the following train of argument:—"That it is upon the principle of protecting property that the common law, in cases not aided nor prejudiced by statute, shelters the privacy and seclusion of thoughts and sentiments committed to writing, and desired by the author to remain not generally known; that, such being the nature and foundation of the common law as to manuscript, its operation cannot of necessity be confined to literary subjects. "Wherever the produce of labour is liable to invasion in an analogous manner, there must be a title to analogous protection or redress." His Honour also quotes with approbation what was said by Mr. Justice Yates in Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303, that an author's case is exactly similar to that of an inventor of a new mechanical machine, that both original inventions stand upon the same footing in point of property; and that the immorality of pirating another man's invention is as great as that of purloining his ideas.

In order completely to understand the view which was taken by Lord Cottenham of this case, it is necessary to state the main facts involved—they were as follows:—that the defendant Strange had published a catalogue of certain etchings, the work and private property of Prince Albert and the Queen. This catalogue, descriptive of the works themselves, also advertised a public exhibition of copies surreptitiously obtained by one of the defendants, and the whole professed to be by the permission of her Majesty and the Prince Consort. His lordship, assuming that the right of the plaintiff to an injunction restraining the defendant from dealing in any manner with the etchings themselves, was clear, considered that the only question was as to the catalogue; and especially as to the representation there held out that its publication was by permission of the Queen and her Consort. This he considered to be a complete case of an intention to sell under a false representation; and that as all manufacturers are, as a matter of course, restrained from selling their goods under similar misrepresentation tending to impose upon the public, and to prejudice others, it would be singular if the like restraint should not be imposed in the case before him.

It may, no doubt, be urged that in the case of trade-marks there is no such property as this; no doubt there are many expressions in the older cases which would seem to justify such an assertion. I will admit that there is no property in a mere name or mark; but by the use of such a name or mark injuriously affecting the rights of any person who has established his claim to use it to distinguish articles of his manufacture, according to recent decisions at any rate, there is an injury done to property. Having therefore once fixed the notion of this species of property, the analogy between the cases to which I have referred above, and those of trade-marks, more properly so called, is, to my mind, no longer far-fetched or illusory.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—LINCOLN'S-INN.

July 20.—Hartlett v. Wood.—This was an appeal from Vice-Chancellor Stuart. The suit was instituted for the administration of an estate, and also for the purpose of setting aside a sale alleged to have been improperly made by the defendant, who was a trustee under Bartlett's will. The Vice-Chancellor at the hearing of the cause, directed certain enquiries to be made respecting the sale, which resulted in the allegations of impropriety being disproved. Upon the cause, however, coming before the Court on further considerations, his Honour directed all the costs to be paid, as between solicitor and client, out of the testator's estate, which was bequeathed by the will in trust for the infant children of the testator. The question raised by the appeal was as to the practice of the Court in directing the payment of costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said there was no greater inducement for persons to come into the Court of Chancery with unfounded litigation than the unfortunate degree of uncertainty which existed upon the subject of costs. As a general rule, the costs ought to follow the event. In administration suits, however, it behoved the Court to attend most carefully to the subject of costs, and the rule ought, in his (the Lord Chancellor's) opinion, to be that those costs only ought to be allowed out of the estate which had been incurred in proceedings originally directed with a reasonable and proper foundation for the benefit of the estate, or which had in their result conduced to that end. In the present case he should confine his observations to the costs occasioned by the allegations in the bill in reference to the sale. Those allegations charged fraud on the part of the trustee; but upon enquiry, all of them were disproved, and the Vice-Chancellor, through his chief clerk, certified that they were without foundation. Nine-tenths of the whole costs had been caused by those allegations, and the question of costs had now become more important than the original subject of complaint. His lordship directed that so much of the plaintiff's costs of the suit as had been incurred through the allegations of fraud in the bill should be disallowed, and that the remainder of his costs should be taxed as between party and party.

ROLLS' COURT.

(Before the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.)

July 22.—The Sutors' Fee Fund.—Upon the hearing of a cause of Wilkinson v. Duncan a question was raised as to the payment out of court of a sum of money upon the personal indemnity of the party receiving it. His Honour said that as the Sutors' Fee Fund would be liable to repay the amount in case the person receiving it failed to do so, it became important, after the suggested appropriation of the Sutors' Fee Fund, that the Court should be very careful in payment of moneys in these cases. He had had as many as 60 or 70 applications for payment of moneys out of the fund, and in some cases upwards of 60 years had elapsed since they had been paid in. Scarcely a petition day passed without some application being made for payment of money out of the fund.

SUMMER ASSIZES.—MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

LINCOLN.

July 20.—The Lord Chief Baron opened the commission here to-day. There were 16 causes entered for trial.

DERBY.

July 25.—The commission was opened in this town to-day by Mr. Justice Willes.

HOME CIRCUIT.

LEWES.

July 19.—The commission was opened here to-day. There were only 9 causes entered for trial.

The Right Honourable Edward Cardwell has been appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Edwin Wilkins Field, 36, Lincoln's-inn-fields, Middlesex, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Middlesex, and for the cities of London and Westminster.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, July 23.

SALMON FISHERIES BILL.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill, and explained that it was introduced in order to forbid practices which had considerably diminished, and still continued to diminish.

The Earl of MALMESBURY thought the measure a practicable one, and such as ought to become law.

After a few observations from the Earl of LONSDALE and Lord LEANOVER the Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, July 22.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The order of the day for resuming the consideration of the Lords' amendments in this Bill having been read,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he presumed, after the decision arrived at the other night for restoring the clauses relating to the appointment of the chief judge, that the House would not now think it necessary to discuss at any length the other subsidiary amendments consequent upon that change.

Sir H. CAIRNS thought it would be useless to discuss the amendments which treated of the office of the chief judge.

The House then disagreed accordingly with the various amendments made by the Lords on the subject of the chief judge.

On clause 21, in which the Lords had increased the number of official assignees from five to eight,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, as the provisional assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvents would, by the 26th clause, be constituted an official assignee of the Court of Bankruptcy, if the present amendment of the Lords were agreed to, and eight were substituted for five, the number of official assignees in London would, in fact, be increased to nine. That would, he thought, be entailing useless expense on the country. He therefore moved that the Lords' amendment be disagreed with.

Sir H. CAIRNS said the Government had given notice of two cardinal points on which they proposed to disagree with the Lords' amendments. The one referred to the chief judge, which had already been settled, and the other, which had still to be determined, referred to the official assignees. The present amendment had been introduced by the Lords in consequence of the general view they took with respect to the official assignees. Hitherto all bankrupt estates had been vested in the official assignees and the creditors together, who acted through one and the same solicitor in realizing the whole of the estate and dividing it among all the creditors. No doubt there had been a great deal of complaint in the commercial world on the subject of the official assignees. But the House must endeavour to see what was the origin of that complaint. It did not originate because the official assignees did not do the business properly, or collect the debts and divide the assets with rapidity among the creditors, but rather because the official assignees were entitled to take a very large percentage from the sums recovered, and thereby the amount divisible among the creditors was very much diminished. Those objections were got rid of by this Bill, because it placed the official assignees upon salaries instead of percentage, the five official assignees in London receiving £1,200 a year, reducible to £1,000, and those in the country £1,000 a year, reducible to £800. The Bill also provided that a bankrupt's estate should at first be vested in the official assignee, but that when the creditors' assignee was appointed all control of the estate should be taken from the official assignee, except that he was to collect the debts due to the bankrupt under £10, while the debts of a larger amount would be collected by the creditors' assignee. In the House of Lords exception had been taken to that arrangement, and it was urged that the consequence would be that the official assignee and the creditors' assignee would have to employ separate solicitors, of course entailing upon the estate two bills of costs. Another difficulty would arise from the proposed arrangement. The official assignee would require the bankrupt's books to enable him to collect the debts under £10, while the creditors' assignee would want them for the purpose of collecting the larger debts. That state of things would lead to inconvenience and antagonism, as well as to confusion and expense. There was an idea which was prevalent in the commercial world that if the Lords' amendments were agreed to there would be no mode by which the creditors could get rid of the official assignee if they desired to place the management of an estate in the hands of trustees selected by themselves. That, however, was a mistake, because under the arrangement clauses any body of creditors desiring to wind-up an estate without the assistance of an official assignee could do so. But he would ask whether it was judicious to have five official assignees at £1,200 a year and seven or eight at £1,000 a year solely to collect debts under £10. It might be said, on the other side, that official assignees might be chosen as trustees by the creditors; but if that were so he thought those officers should stipulate for their remuneration with those who employed them. The suggestion that they might be sometimes chosen as trustees by creditors rather militated against the assertion that official assignees were extremely distasteful to the mercantile community. He submitted, therefore, that there was much force in the opinions expressed by the House of Lords, but, looking at the period of the session, and considering that this point was not absolutely essential, he should not invite the House to divide in opposition to the Attorney-General's motion.

Mr. MURRAY believed that in the London district one official assignee to each commissioner was quite sufficient for the work to be done. He thought the time had arrived when creditors should take the management of bankrupt estates into their own hands, for the expenses incurred under the present system were far greater than any bankrupt estate ought to bear. Under the management of official assignees creditors were apt to fancy that everything was being done that ought to be done, whereas estates were very much neglected, and the interests of creditors left to suffer. On these grounds he was opposed to the Lords' amendment.

Mr. GLYN said that in the city of London the desire to prevent estates from falling into the hands of the Court of Bankruptcy was so strong that trustees had exposed themselves to the greatest possible legal difficulties in consequence.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the official assignees were brought into existence by the Act of 1831. The evils connected with the management of insolvent estates by the creditors' assignees were at that time considerable, and caused great dissatisfaction. But, in endeavouring to avoid one evil, the Legislature fell into the other extreme. The creditors' assignees, in consequence of not being subject to an audit neglected their duty. The official assignees then collected the debts, and had the management of very considerable funds, yet no proper audit of their accounts was instituted, or was in operation. A form of audit by the commissioner no doubt existed, but the commissioner had not that knowledge of the matter which was necessary to make him a satisfactory or competent auditor. A return had been made in 1858, with reference to the number of official assignees who had died or been removed, and who had been defaulters. Four of the official assignees in London, and one in the country, had defaulted, the amount of their defalcations being not less than £110,000.

Mr. BOVILL said that official assignees had been appointed because it was found that creditors' assignees did not perform their duties. This matter was fully considered on the second reading, and as various mercantile bodies had expressed a strong feeling for the clauses which passed that House, he should not oppose their restoration to the Bill, but he suggested that, instead of providing that all debts under £10 should be collected by the official assignee, it should be left to the creditors in each case to determine the amount up to which the official assignee should collect.

Mr. HENLEY observed that, as it was the wish of the House that the general question should be decided on this clause, he was disposed to agree with the Government and to disagree with the amendment of the Lords. He thought it was impossible for any one who paid attention to what passed not to know that the commercial body wished to get rid of the official assignee to a great extent, and to have greater facilities for making their arrangements, and if they thought that they could manage their affairs better than the lawyers he did not see why they should not be allowed to do so.

The Lords' amendment was then disagreed with.

In clauses 22 and 27 certain amendments of the Lords were disagreed with, and some were concurred in.

Sir F. KELLY moved that the House should disagree with so much of the new clause introduced between clauses 97 and 98 as deprived debtors whose assets did not amount to £150 of the power of petitioning for an adjudication in bankruptcy against themselves.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL seconded the motion. The effect of the clause as it now stood would be to prevent any person who might not be able to show assets to the amount of £150 from obtaining a discharge from his debts without being within the walls of a prison and remaining there for some weeks.

Mr. MALINS and Mr. BOVILL also supported the motion, which was agreed to.

On clause 100,

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL stated that paragraph C had been inserted by the Lords with respect to debts contracted or liabilities incurred after the passing of the Act, on which considerable difference of opinion prevailed; but with a view to the passing of the Bill he was not disposed to ask the House to disturb the principle of the amendment. The Lords, however, appeared to have overlooked the fact that by the law as it now stood, if a debtor not a trader lay in prison, any execution creditor was at liberty to apply by petition to the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and obtain a vesting order, the effect of which was to vest all the present and future estate of the debtor up to the time of his discharge, real and personal, in the assignee of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, to be administered for the benefit of creditors. He proposed after the word "trader" to insert these words:—"And not being at the time a prisoner against whom the creditors would be entitled to obtain a vesting order in insolvency if this Act had not passed." With a view to carry into effect the object of the Lords in this clause he would also add a proviso to the 164th clause to the effect that no person shall be liable by virtue of this Act to any criminal charge or penalty in respect of any matter which may have occurred before the passing of the Act to which he would not have been liable if this Act had not passed. He had had the advantage of communicating these amendments to his hon. and learned friend the member for Belfast, and he was authorised to say that he had no objection to them.

Mr. HENLEY thought the proposal of the hon. and learned gentleman quite a fair one. It left parties as they were, and that was all that was wished or contended for.

The words proposed were then inserted.

Mr. MALINS said that, as to the 101st clause of the Bill, that clause would enable a rich debtor to set his creditors at defiance, and to keep his property while his debts remained unpaid. The principle was plain, that no man had a vested right in dishonesty, and therefore he said that a non-trader, with ample property to meet his debts, ought to be made to pay them, and the law should hold out no inducement to him to remain abroad in order to evade payment. He should take the opinion of the House upon the clause, and therefore moved that the Lords' amendment be expunged.

Mr. HENLEY hoped the Government would support the clause as recommended by themselves, and that they would not, by agreeing to the proposition of the hon. member for Wallingford, endanger the passing of the Bill.

Mr. HADFIELD supported the proposal of the hon. member for Wallingford, because he thought there ought to be no distinction between the classes in respect to paying their debts.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL declined to accede to the amendment.

Mr. WALPOLE opposed the amendment.

After a few words from Mr. MALINS,

The amendment was withdrawn, and the House agreed to the Lords' amendment.

Several other amendments of the Lords having been considered, were in some instances agreed to, and in others disagreed from.

On the motion of the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, a proviso was added to the 164th clause, to the effect that no person should be liable to be prosecuted for any offence after the passing of the Act for which he would not have been liable to be prosecuted if the Act had not passed.

On the motion of Mr. MOFFATT, the House disagreed with the Lord's amendment in clause 200, making the assent of three-fourths in number of the creditors necessary to the validity of any deed executed by a debtor, and restored the clause to its original shape by the insertion of the words "a majority in number of the creditors representing three-fourths of the value."

Similar words were, on the motion of Mr. MOFFATT, inserted in clause 208.

The remaining amendments, which were of a formal nature, having all been disposed of,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that a committee be appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the Lords' amendments, and to manage a conference with the other House.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee nominated as follows:—The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Sir G. C. Lewis, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Malins.

Wednesday, July 24.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

On the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading of this Bill, Sir G. C. LEWIS said that he was favourable to the measure, but in the absence of the right hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill (Mr. Walpole) he would move that the order be postponed until next Wednesday. At the same time, he did not think it likely the Bill would pass during the present session.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which, he said, was twofold, namely, to provide for a more frequent visitation of the lunatics under the care of the Court of Chancery, and to diminish the expense of the procedure. The recommendations of the committee of 1858, who considered this subject, were in some respects adopted in the Bill, but the recommendation of the committee that the care of the Chancery lunatics should be transferred to the lunacy commissioners was not followed, as it was thought that the duties of those commissioners were at present sufficiently onerous.

Mr. HENLEY: The provision of the Bill which gave a new power of dealing with the property of lunatics under a certain amount was as important as any in the Bill. He deemed it a beneficial provision, but its advantage would be very much impaired if these unfortunate persons, scattered all over the country, were to be driven up to one of the Chancery offices in London to get the benefit of the proposed arrangement. There ought to be some machinery by which the benefit of that provision might be more easily obtainable over the length and breadth of the land. There was a clause in the Bill enabling pensions to be given to the present visitors, but he did not know on what principle they were supposed to be entitled to pensions at all; and while the Bill enacted that every lunatic should be personally visited twice at least in every year, the only machinery by which that object could be effected was cut out of the measure. After pointing out what he conceived to be other deficiencies in the Bill, he concluded by moving, by way of amendment, the postponement of the second reading for a week, in order that his right hon. friend the member for Cambridge University, who had devoted so much time and attention to the subject, might have an opportunity of urging whatever objections he entertained to the measure.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought that if he undertook not to move the committee on the Bill until that day week, the object which the right hon. gentleman had in view would be answered.

Mr. HENLEY understood that his right hon. friend wished to oppose the second reading.

After a few words from Mr. CONINGHAM and Sir G. GREY,

Mr. HENLEY consented to withdraw his amendment on the understanding that his right hon. friend would not be considered as precluded from opposing the Bill on the motion that the House resolve into committee upon it.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn, and the Bill was read a second time.

PROSECUTIONS EXPENSES BILL.

Upon the motion for the second reading of this Bill,

Mr. HENLEY observed that in 1846 the payment of expenses for prosecutions was given to the justices; but the Treasury kept a very strict hand over them, and it was even thought by many that the strictness was carried so far as to impede the administration of justice. By this Bill the Government might sanction a higher scale of fees than at present existed, but the difference of cost was to be borne by the counties. The Treasury might go on decreasing its own scale, and this still further increased the burden cast upon the rateable property of the country.

Sir G. C. LEWIS would be glad to withdraw the Bill if such a course would not be inconsistent with the engagements into which he had entered. There was a scale of allowances to witnesses, and the payments out of the Consolidated Fund were regulated according to that scale, but complaints were made in some counties that that scale was insufficient, and many representations of that nature had been made to him, especially from Yorkshire and Lancashire. It was not considered advisable to raise the scale in all the counties throughout England, because in many parts the present scale of allowances was considered sufficient, neither was it considered desirable to have different scales of allowances for different counties. It was therefore proposed to give the magistrates power to make supplemental allowances, and to charge the cost upon the county rates. That power, however, was permissive and not compulsory.

Mr. S. ESTCOURT thought that as the insufficiency of the present scale of allowances was mostly felt in Lancashire and Yorkshire, it would be better to limit the operation of this Bill to those counties.

Sir W. MILES said the dissatisfaction at the present scale of allowances was more widely extended than his right hon. friend seemed to think. The commission which inquired into this subject two years ago, and of which he was a member, suggested some alterations, but certainly nothing like the provisions of this Bill, to give the Treasury power still further to reduce the scale of allowances. In one respect, at least, he hoped the Bill would be altered. If the justices sent in a new scale, and that scale was sanctioned by the Home Secretary, it would become a permanent scale, while the charge upon the county-rate might afterwards be increased by a further reduction in the scale allowed by the Treasury.

Sir G. C. LEWIS had no objection to transfer the power from the Home Secretary to the county magistrates.

Mr. HENLEY objected to that, as it would entail all the odium upon the justices.

It being now a quarter to six o'clock the debate was adjourned.

Thursday, July 25.

COPYRIGHT OF DESIGNS BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

Recent Decisions.

EQUITY.

SOLICITOR'S RIGHT OF LIEN ON PAPERS.

Webster v. Le Hunt, V. C. K., 9 W. R. 804.

We considered lately (p. 618) what is the solicitor's right of lien on papers where he has discharged his client, and we showed that the client is entitled in such a case to have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity and as little expense as if the connection had not been dissolved. In order to attain this object, he is entitled to have his papers delivered to his new solicitor, upon his undertaking to return them as soon as the immediate purpose of their delivery has been attained. Such is the rule where the solicitor has discharged the client, but where the client has discharged the solicitor, it might have been supposed that the rule was different. It would seem, however, that in the case now before us, this distinction has been disregarded. A solicitor had agreed, in this case, to carry on his client's suit without requiring any funds for the purpose till the hearing. A decree was made, and the client appealed from it. The solicitor declined to act in the appeal without funds, and a fresh solicitor was appointed. A motion was now made that the old solicitor might hand over the papers to the new one without prejudice to his lien; and Vice-Chancellor Kindersley made the order. He admitted that this solicitor had the right, after the original hearing, to refuse to go on without funds; but he denied that he had the right, by withholding the papers, to prevent the course of justice, "although he had a right to his lien, whatever it was." We think that this qualification, "whatever it was," is reasonable. Certainly, if the papers are to be handed over to the new solicitor for all the purposes for which they can be required, the value of the lien of the old solicitor becomes inappreciable. He has done without payment as much business as he agreed to do, and he declines to do more. Probably his only chance of payment is to be found in this lien on the papers in the cause which the present decision has annihilated. The Vice-Chancellor said expressly, "the order to change solicitors was a discharge by the client;" and he then proceeded to make the order which we should have expected him to make if he had held that there had been a discharge by the solicitor.

It must be observed that this decision of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley is, to some extent, at least, supported by the case of Heslop v. Metcalfe, 3 My. & Cr. 183, to which we referred in our former article on this subject. In that case, the solicitor, after acting for about fifteen months, delivered his bill of costs in the suit, shewing a balance due to him, after giving credit for certain sums advanced by the client. Shortly afterwards, the solicitor wrote a letter requesting payment of a larger balance due on his general bill of costs, and saying that if it were not paid, the client must abide the consequences. In a subsequent letter, he stated that he should proceed no further in the cause unless the request contained in his previous letter were complied with. Under these circumstances, Lord Cottenham considered that the solicitor had retired from the performance of his duty in the cause. After an examination of the facts proved in the case, his lordship said that they amounted "to a withdrawal from the office of solicitor;" and therefore he held that the rule laid down by Lord Eldon for securing the convenience of the client became applicable. It is, however, by no means certain that Lord Cottenham would have made a similar order in such a case as that now before us. In Heslop v. Metcalfe, the client had paid money on account, the solicitor demanded payment not only of the balance due to him in the suit, but of a general balance, and there had been no previous stipulation as to the time beyond which the solicitor should not be expected to proceed, unless he were supplied with funds. All these circumstances distinguish Heslop v. Metcalfe from the case lately before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley; and besides his Honour himself distinguishes the two cases by saying that the latter was a case of discharge by the client, whereas Lord Cottenham treated the former as a case of discharge by the solicitor. We doubt, therefore, whether the Vice-Chancellor's decision is fully justified by authority, and it certainly does not seem altogether easy to reconcile it with principle.

COMMON LAW.

GUARANTEE, CONTRACT OF—PAST AND FUTURE DEBTS.

Westhead v. Sproson, Ex. 9 W. R. 695.

It is an essential ingredient in the contract of guarantee that something is to be done by the party to whom it is given. It is true that a guarantee may well be given of a debt already incurred (as was the case in White v. Woodward, 5 C. B. 810), but then it must be in consideration of a future advance or supply of goods to the debtor. In the present case, the guarantee was in like manner in respect of supplies on credit already made, and hereafter to be made; and the consideration was that the creditor would in future credit the debtor with such goods as he might require, and the creditor might think fit to supply; and on this promise an action, before any additional supply, was made, was brought to recover the value of the advances already made. It was, however, held that no action lay until a fresh advance was made, when both that and the past debt might be recovered from the surety. Until such advance the agreement was void for want of mutuality. For the only engagement on the part of the plaintiff was to supply if he thought fit to do so, which amounted to nothing and formed no valid consideration for the guarantee.

It may be remarked that in the 3rd vol. of Broderip & Bingham's reports (p. 211) a guarantee is mentioned somewhat in the form of that in the present case, being in respect of "the present account of A. B." and of "what she may contract from this date" to a future date. This guarantee was held to be good, although it might be argued (as in the present case) that inasmuch as there are two sides to every contract, there was no certainty of there being, as affairs turned out, any future advances. But it is to be observed that from the report of this case it does not appear whether before action brought, any fresh contract for the supply of goods had in point of fact been entered into. Indeed, the only question there argued, seems to have been whether a consideration sufficiently appeared on the face of the instrument.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—WHAT MAY BE RECOVERED ON THE COMMON COUNT FOR WORK AND MATERIALS.

Lee v. Griffin, Q. B. 9 W. R. 702.

This was a hard case for the plaintiff, who, being a surgeon-dentist, had received an order from a patient for some artificial teeth, which he made in due course, but in the meantime the patient fell ill and died before they could be either fitted or delivered. Now the value of these teeth being more than £10, the case fell under the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), which does not allow a contract for the sale of goods to that price and upwards to be good unless either the buyer shall accept and actually receive a portion or shall give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment, or unless some memorandum or note in writing of the bargain be made and signed by the party to be signed or his lawfully authorised agent. This provision, it is true, applied originally only to such goods as were actually made at the time of contract, and were then in a state for delivery, which would not meet the case in question, the teeth being at that time still to be manufactured by the plaintiff; but a later statute, known as Lord Tenterden's Act (9

Geo. 4, s. 14), extended the 17th section of 29 Car. 2, c. 3, to cases where the goods were not at the time of the contract of sale actually made, procured, or provided, or fit and ready for delivery. And, as in the present case, as no written agreement had been entered into (though an imperfect correspondence on the subject had passed between the parties), nor any of the alternatives above-mentioned taken place, the only resource of the plaintiff to obtain payment for what he had done on his patient's express retainer, was to charge his executor for the teeth as for work and labour done, and materials provided by him for the testator at his request. But here the Court interfered, and placed a construction on such a count (which is one of the "common counts") which was fatal to the plaintiff's success. They held that under such a count, the value of no article can be recovered which is not entirely subordinate and auxiliary to the work and labour performed therein, and that it by no means followed that it can be recovered on such count because the skill of the plaintiff made the article of value. The case which was chiefly relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff was the recent one of Clay v. Yates (1 H. & N. 73), in which it was held by the Court of Exchequer that the cost of supplying paper, and printing thereon the manuscript of the defendant, might be sued for as work and labour, and consequently did not come within the provisions of the statutes above referred to. And the Chief Baron intimated his opinion to be that "in the case of a work of art, whether in gold or silver, marble or plaster, where the application of skill and labour is of the highest description, and the material is of no importance as compared with the labour, the price may be recovered as work, labour, and materials." Now, according to this direction, it is certainly difficult to distinguish the position of the plaintiff in the present case; and so the Queen's Bench appears to have thought: for both Mr. Justice Crompton and Mr. Justice Blackburn, in giving their judgment for the defendant, stated that they doubted whether the law was properly laid down in Clay v. Yates; while the remaining judge present, Mr. Justice Hill, preferred resting his concurrence in the judgment of the court upon a distinct ground not material to the present question, viz., that by the terms of the order given in this particular instance, the teeth were not to be paid for until they were fitted, an operation which, owing to the death (as above-mentioned), never, in fact, took place.

Taylor v. Humphreys, C. P. 9 W. R. 705.

This case is an express affirmance of a previous decision of the same Court on the proper construction of the Sunday Trading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 118) s. 2. This was the case of Atkinson v. Sellers, of which an account was given in a preceding volume;* and in which the chief point was, the legal definition of a "traveller" within that provision. The Court then, as now, protested against the ambiguity of the term as used by the Legislature; but held that provided the persons supplied with refreshment within prohibited hours were in the course of a journey, they must be held to be travellers; and that it was immaterial, for this purpose, whether they were journeying for pleasure or on business. And in the present case a conviction was quashed on the authority of this reading of the Act, where certain persons had asked for and obtained refreshment during the hours of Divine service, at the end of a walk taken for amusement or exercise, of four or five miles from their place of residence—having, it should be observed, replied in the affirmative to the question of the innkeeper before he admitted them, as to whether they were travellers. And this suggests a difficulty which in these cases must often in the nature of things arise, as to the knowledge on the part of a person charged under the Act, with respect to the real character of the persons whom he entertains. Neither the existing Act, nor the statute on the same subject which it repeals (17 & 18 Vict. c. 79), contains any provision about the onus of proof or the amount of evidence required in these cases. And it is difficult to see the limit which may be safely drawn by the landlord, if the assertion of him who demands refreshment is not enough; and yet if it is to be held sufficient, an appeal to the veracity of a thirsty applicant seems but a slender protection for the object of the Legislature.

DEVISE OF REAL ESTATE.

Referring to the question put by J. N. C., in the Solicitor's Journal of the 13th instant, it seems clear that S. H. took a vested estate as tenant in common in fee. It is laid down in "Jarman on Wills," 3rd edit., vol. 2, pp. 143, 144, that on a devise or bequest "to A. for life, and after his decease to the children of B., the children (if any) of B. living at the death of the testator, together with those who happen to be born during the life of A., the tenant for life, are entitled," and that in cases falling within this rule, the children (if any) living at the death of the testator take an immediately vested interest in their shares, subject to the diminution of those shares, as the number of objects is augmented by future births, during the life of the tenant for life; and that, consequently, on the death of any of the children, during the life of the tenant for life, their shares (if their interest therein is transmissible) devolve to their respective representatives. That the estate of S. H. was transmissible will appear by reference to page 237 of the volume cited above, where it is stated that "it has long been settled that the words 'equally to be divided' or 'to be divided,' will create a tenancy in common." T. D.

In answer to your correspondent, J. N. C. (ante, p. 632), the children of H. each take a vested remainder under the will of S. (see "Jarman's Wills by Sweet," 3rd edit., pp. 289, 290). And by the Wills Act 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict., c. 26, s. 3, it is declared that it shall be lawful for every person to devise by his will, &c., &c., and that the power thereby given shall extend "to all contingent executory or other future interests in any real or personal estate, &c." C. W. W.

Your correspondent's signed, J. N. C., in the Journal of the 13th instant, may, I think, be answered in the affirmative. I beg to refer him to Sturges v. Pearson, 4 Mad. 411, and see also 6 Mad. 250; and to sect. 3 of the Wills Act, 7 Will. 4, & 1 Vict. c. 26. C. W. W.

EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.—ELEGIT.

An equity of redemption cannot, as I understand the law, be extended under an elegit. It thus be so, that writ is a delusion, since few debtors against whom it would be put in force have unencumbered real estates. The law should surely be altered in this respect, now that registered judgments are deprived of their efficacy, and considering that there are many cases—several such have come under my notice lately—where the only source from which the creditor can hope for payment is the real estate of the debtor. IRISH ANTE-UNION STATUTES.

The object of my former remarks* was merely to direct attention to the mode in which an Irish Ante-Union Statute should be brought to the knowledge of an English Court. I made no comment on any other point in the case. I should think, however, that the evidence of an expert could not be required on the construction of the statute on which the question at Warwick arose, the general principles of law, including those relative to the interpretation of statutes, being notoriously identical in England and Ireland, and there being no specially Irish terms in the enactment in question. As to proof of the statute not having been repealed before the Union, I apprehend there is a presumption of law that any given statute is unrepealed. When the one side had proved the statute, the burden of showing its repeal was thrown on the other side.

It struck me that the course taken in the Warwick case was new; and such an innovation, if it be one, is gravely to be deprecated. F. S. R.

PROBATE COURT DISTRICT REGISTRARS' NEW FEES.

If you would kindly mention in to-morrow's number of your Paper that memorials on this subject from the Liverpool, Hull, Birmingham, Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Gloucestershire Law Societies have been already presented to the Treasury, it might incite other law societies and solicitors in towns not having a law society to follow the good example.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

SUPREME COURT OF BOMBAY.—CROWN SIDE.

(Before the FULL COURT.)

June 6.—The Queen v. Jamsetjee Burjorjee.—Mr. Anstey moved on behalf of the prisoner, Jamsetjee Burjorjee, for a rule nisi to quash the coroner's inquisition on the bodies of Byroo Sultan and four others. The inquisition was held on the 30th and 31st of last month before H. Cleveland, Esq., coroner of Bombay, on view of the bodies of Byroo Sultan and four others, who were killed by the falling on them of a portion of the earth which they had been digging at the Maneekjee Petty spinning and weaving factory; and the jury having returned a verdict of manslaughter against the prisoner, who was contractor of the work, as having feloniously and unlawfully caused the death of the deceased persons. The grounds of the motion were, firstly, that the inquisition was not perfected when the proceedings were returned to this Court by the coroner, and that only the proceedings and not the verdict of the jury had been returned; secondly, that the proceedings of the inquisition were not written on parchment, as was required by the statute law in cases of manslaughter and murder; and thirdly, that on the face of the evidence, no criminal offence or unlawful homicide had been established against the prisoner. Mr. Anstey read the depositions recorded before the coroner of two of the fellow labourers of the deceased to show that they were employed by the Muccadam, Sooryaba, whom they looked upon as their master, that they obeyed Sooryaba, who followed the instructions received from the prisoner, that the prisoner had called at the place the day before the accident had occurred, and told them to dig in a slope, and that he was present at the time of the accident. Having referred to the evidence of the engineer, Mr. Rowlands, which was scientific, given after examination of the scene of the accident, and that of the prisoner, Mr. Anstey remarked that on the body of evidence the Coroner had written a memorandum summing up the case to a jury consisting of Hindoos, who were of course ignorant of the law of England, and said he thought it necessary to refer to the affidavit of Mr. Prentis, who was present at the inquest on behalf of the prisoner, and had taken notes of the proceedings. Mr. Prentis gives the following as the summing up of the Coroner:—"These five persons have been killed and you have to inquire the cause of their deaths. There is no doubt that they were killed by the earth falling on them. You must find out the cause. It is not sufficient to say that it was the will of God that this earth should fall and kill these persons, the ground may have been dug in such a way that it might have stood all the night and part of the day and had then fallen down. If that was caused by any person, that person was responsible. Mr. Rowlands says that it had been worked in a most dangerous and improper manner, he says that a little has been dug away from the bottom at a time and then the superincumbent earth has been allowed to fall. The contractor who has agreed to do it could not have done it at a price had it been done properly. It was his interest to get the earth away as quickly as possible and as cheaply. You are bound not to spare any one, but you must say what was the cause of the accident. Mr. Rowlands says that there has been no precaution to prevent accidents. He considers that the work has been carried on without the slightest regard for the limbs or lives of the persons engaged in it. Mr. Rowlands further says that it ought to have been by three lifts at a time. Any person with common sense would see that the way in which the excavation was carried on was dangerous in the extreme. Soorya declares that he did the work as Jamsetjee directed him to do it. If you believe that Soorya was working under the direction of Jamsetjee Burjorjee I then consider that Jamsetjee Burjorjee is responsible for the deaths of these five men. If Soorya was merely the servant of Jamsetjee he would not be responsible unless it could be shewn that he was aware of the danger or bore malice." Mr. Prentis then goes on to say that the above note represents accurately, to his belief, the substance of the coroner's summing up, save that the coroner referred to a statement made to him by Jamsetjee before Mr. Prentis's arrival at the inquest, and also to Jamsetjee's deposition taken at the inquest, and told the jury that he (Jamsetjee) had not denied the case, or words to that effect. The jury (who were all Hindoos) were then left alone to deliberate on their verdict, and, after some minutes, they said that Jamsetjee had, in their opinion, been guilty of negligence and was to blame. The coroner then asked them whether they intended that as a verdict of manslaughter, upon which they said they did. The coroner signified his approval of such verdict, made a memorandum of it in writing, and issued his warrant for the commitment of Jamsetjee for manslaughter. He was accordingly apprehended and lodged in the common gaol of Bombay on the 31st May. On the 3rd June, Mr. Prentis obtained from his lordship the Chief Justice an order for a writ of habeas corpus to have the body of Jamsetjee before his lordship at his house on Malabar Hill on the following day at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. The order was obtained with the object of applying, on the return of the writ, that Jamsetjee might be admitted to bail on the commitment for manslaughter. In consequence of a letter addressed to the coroner by Messrs. Acland and Prentis, that officer sent to the Chief Justice the depositions recorded by him, but they were unaccompanied by any writing or memorandum of a verdict or any inquisition. No one attended before his lordship on behalf of the prosecution, and Jamsetjee was admitted to bail and discharged from custody on the afternoon of the 4th instant. On the 3rd instant Mr. Anstey appeared before Mr. Brown, magistrate, on behalf of the prisoner, but no one attended to conduct the prosecution or to watch it, nor had the coroner's depositions been then furnished to the magistrate. On Mr. Anstey asking the magistrate to dismiss the charge he said he felt a difficulty in doing so, as the case had already been investigated by the coroner, but that he would consider whether he would or would not dismiss it. Mr. Prentis believed that, but for the verdict taken in the inquest, the magistrate would have dismissed the case. At an adjourned investigation the coroner's depositions were sent to the magistrate, but without any entry of a verdict or any memorandum. From these circumstances Mr. Prentis believed that it was not the intention of Government or of any person to proceed against the defendant on the charge of manslaughter.

Mr. Anstey submitted that on the face of all the facts adduced in the evidence, and according to the authorities he would cite to the Court, no offence whatever appeared to have been committed by the prisoner. In the case of Reg. v. Cullie (Ad. & Ell.) the Court set aside the inquisition on an apparent defect—viz., the want of any evidence or facts showing the crime which was manslaughter, and the reason given was two-fold—that it was bad in point of law and that the jury was not justified in coming to such a conclusion.

Mr. Justice ARNOULD.—What is your ground, Mr. Anstey? Is it that there is no personal misconduct on the part of the prisoner?

Mr. Anstey.—I am coming to that. I find no instance of conviction of manslaughter on evidence that the prisoner was accessory before the fact; and for this reason, because it is a felony committed without deliberation. In our criminal jurisprudence, in the crime of manslaughter though there may be accessories after the fact, there can be no accessories before the fact. It is of the essence of manslaughter that the act is sudden and there is no previous knowledge or intention. In strict conformity with this opinion there are two recent decisions of the Court of Criminal Cases Reserved and of the Queen's Bench. Reg. v. William Bennett, 7 WEEKLY REPORTER, is a very strong case, as it contained an element which does not exist here. In defiance of the statute law Bennett openly carried on the business of supplying fire works, and had a factory for the purpose, as also a quantity of combustible materials in his own house. Whilst the prisoner was out of the house an explosion took place of the combustible substances worked by his servants, the fire spread among other fireworks, a rocket shot across the street, set fire to a neighbouring house and caused the death of a person. Bennett was convicted of manslaughter, but the conviction was not justified by the facts of the case and was afterwards quashed. It was not shewn to be his misdemeanour, but that of his servants. In the case of Reg. v. Pocock death had occurred directly from the bad state of the road, but still the conviction of the prisoner of the crime of manslaughter was subsequently quashed.

Chief Justice SAUSSE.—There is a case, I remember, in the 5 WEEKLY REPORTER, in which death was caused by the omission of the prisoner to put the cover to a shaft in a coal pit.

Mr. Anstey.—In that case (Reg. v. David Hughes, 5 WEEKLY REPORTER, 753) the prisoner, who was captain of a gang working at a coal-pit, opened the mouth and went away without replacing it, as he ought to have done; owing to his neglect to put the stage on the mouth of the shaft, a truck fell into the pit and killed a man, and it was held by the Court that his omission had directly caused the death.

Chief Justice SAUSSE.—This last case shows that a party may be held liable for manslaughter, even if he was not present at the time of the accident, and that presence is not necessary to an act of homicide.

Mr. Anstey.—I don't say that a man cannot be indicted if he is directly concerned in the act, although at the time he may be absent. In that case the prisoner's omission or neglect to cover the shaft was considered the proximate cause of death, and accordingly he was held liable for manslaughter.

Mr. Justice ARNOULD.—The question is whether there were no directions given by the Parsee.

Mr. Anstey.—There is no evidence to show that the directions given the night before the accident were such as to have caused the accident. The prisoner had given orders to the men to dig in a slope, and if they had done so no accident could have occurred, for according to the evidence of Mr. Rowlands, the earth would not have fallen down if dug in a slope. I say therefore that the principle of law is maintained by all recent decisions, and there is not a single case where for accidents of this sort the doctrine of respondent superior is applied to, except for holding parties liable for homicide per infortunium.

Mr. Westropp, Amicus Curie.—I know of a case, Reg. v. Lowe, which will assist your Lordships. In that case an engineer who was employed to manage an engine in lifting up men, left the engine in charge of a boy who said that he was incompetent to manage it, in coming up a man was killed, and the engineer was held liable for manslaughter.

Chief Justice SAUSSE.—The evidence here is that the prisoner directed the mode in which the excavation was to be made, and Soorya says he dug exactly as the prisoner showed him. Having intervened and his directions specifically carried out, the question is, whether he is to be held responsible for the consequences.

Mr. Anstey.—The workmen were not the servants of the prisoner; he was a builder and not an excavator, he contracted for the work with Soorya, who is an excavator, and paid him at a certain rate for every hundred cubic feet. The men besides obeyed the orders of Soorya, whom they regarded as their master and not the prisoner. Prisoner is too remote a cause of the accident, and too remote for damages.

Chief Justice SAUSSE.—Suppose the prisoner was present when those directions were given and if the accident occurred, would he be liable?

Mr. Anstey.—If he was on the spot and if he did not prevent the accident, and if that accident could not be traced to any other cause, he would be liable. The coroner directed the jury that somebody should be punished, that Soorya could not be, and the jury being thus placed in an awkward position found the prisoner guilty. The evidence of Mr. Rowlands is clear, he gives it as his opinion that the accident could not have taken place if the men had dug in the manner in which they say they had been directed by the prisoner to do, namely, in a sloping direction. There was no evidence that the digging was the proximate cause of the accident. This is a monstrous inquisition, for the prisoner is too remote a cause to be connected with the accident, which did not take place in consequence of any of his orders. If there had been a verdict of murder I could not have asked for quashing the inquisition, for it is held that manslaughter is prima facie evidence for murder. The evidence for both is the same, with this exception, that in manslaughter not only the fact of the homicide but all circumstances relating to it must be shewn, and that some evidence is not sufficient. A grievous injustice had been done the prisoner; a man of his high position was carried to jail and confined there from the 31st of May to the 4th June. His attorney says the mere fact of the jury's verdict has prevented the magistrate from dismissing the charge. He is anxious to get rid of the stigma cast upon him by this inquisition, and to take measures for redress, and unless he gets rid of the inquisition he cannot take those measures. The coroner has, I consider, exceeded his jurisdiction, and if your Lordships grant further time to the coroner to shew his authority you will call upon him to shew cause why the inquisition should not be quashed.

Cur. ad. vult.

June 11.—The CHIEF JUSTICE now delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—Here an objection has been made to the inquest on the ground—which we regret very much to say is supported by English and Indian Acts, and by the case of The Queen v. Birley, 7 D. & L.—that the inquisition was on paper, and not on parchment. We feel ourselves coerced to quash the inquisition. It is very much to be regretted that the Legislature at Calcutta should not have paid more regard to the circumstances and practice existing here at least, if not also in Calcutta. Acts ought not to be passed upon these subjects without more consideration. As to the merits of the case, if we could have gone into them, our impression would be against quashing the inquisition, for the legal question would be, was the prisoner present? He was not personally present, but was he constructively present? In p. 4 of Archbold's Criminal Pleading, the principle of constructive presence is very clearly laid down. In The Queen v. Pocock, 17 Q. B., Lord Campbell said that he himself tried a person who entrusted the management of a shaft to one who was incompetent, and declared himself incompetent, and he then absented himself. It was held that the absent person was responsible for the accident, and he was found guilty of manslaughter, and severely punished. In Penton's case, Levinz. Cr. C. 179, persons who threw down a beam and broke a scaffolding, were held guilty of manslaughter, upon the death of a person who afterwards fell down, when it does not appear that those persons were present. In the case of ——— it does not distinctly appear that the wine merchant was present when the cask fell down, for which he was found guilty of manslaughter. The cases of The Queen v. ———, and The Queen v. ———, were cases of manslaughter against captains of ships. Their liability was put upon their giving commands. If the death happened through their commands, they would be held liable. If, therefore, the objection as to the inquisition not being on parchment did not exist, we should have been bound to hold the finding as prima facie sufficient, and leave the party to his defence.

Inquisition quashed.

STRASBOURG.—A curious case recently came before the Tribunal of Commerce of Strasbourg. In March last, MM. Gillet, Hoffer & Co., wholesale grocers in that city, inserted in the local journals advertisements declaring that they had received from a sugar refinery a vast quantity of that article on such terms that they could sell it at a reduction of 20f. per 100 kilogrammes. Several grocers of Strasbourg brought an action against them to obtain damages, on the ground that such an advertisement was what the law calls "unfair competition," inasmuch as it was calculated to entice away their customers, and was, besides, false, the defendants not being in reality able to sell sugar at such a diminution in price. The Tribunal, however, after hearing long technical arguments, decided that the advertisement did not constitute an act of unfair competition, and that it was for the public, not the plaintiffs, to complain if the promise of a reduction in price was not kept. It therefore dismissed the action with costs.

Reviews.

A Dictionary of Dates relating to all Ages and Nations for Universal Reference, comprehending Remarkable Occurrences, Ancient and Modern; the Foundation, Laws, and Governments of Countries; their Progress in Civilization, Industry, Literature, Arts, and Science; their Achievements in Arms; and their Civil, Military, and Religious Institutions; and particularly of the British Empire. By JOSEPH HAYDN. Tenth edition. Revised and greatly enlarged. By BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant-Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain. Moxon & Co. 1861.

This book was written long before a host of small authors had undertaken to inform the British public of that numerous class of things which are not, but ought to be, generally known; and although Mr. Haydn never condescended to avail himself of any of those clap-trap devices common to these gentry, it has already reached its tenth edition, which is the best testimony of its value. The original idea of the work was as happy as it was novel; and, unquestionably, its execution was attended with very great difficulty, and demanded a vast amount of patient drudgery. So many facts of importance have occurred since the history of man commenced to be written, that any one attempting to make a dictionary of their dates could hardly fail to feel great embarrassment from the abundance of the materials which lay around him. Mr. Haydn's notion was to confine the category in the first place to facts of universal interest, such as those relating to the foundation, laws, and governments of countries—their progress and civilisation, industry, literature, arts, and science—their achievements in arms—and their civil, military, and religious institutions—having especial regard to whatever related to the British empire, or was likely to be interesting or useful to Englishmen. All lawyers are familiar with the importance of dates. One of the first things to be acquired by every lawyer is the habit of attending closely to the chronology of such events as are comprised in any case under his consideration. This is equally so, whether he is reading an abstract of title, the proceedings in a chancery suit, or the depositions in a criminal charge. Attention to the order of time is not less necessary to the student who attempts to throw upon any doctrine of law the light of its history. Nothing helps one more towards the discovery of the grounds and reasons and limitations of legal principles, than the habit of reading the decisions in the order of time, and not, as is so frequently the case, as if all the judgments had been delivered contemporaneously. If these remarks are of any force, such a book as Haydn's Dictionary of Dates must be of great value to lawyers, and especially to beginners, from the tendency which frequent reference to it is calculated to produce; and its utility is especially obvious where persons labour under that peculiar defect of memory which makes it difficult to remember the times of occurrences. The habit of mind thus acquired is, however, but an indirect benefit derivable from the frequent perusal of such a work as this, and we only point to it as a consideration which is not to be forgotten in any criticism upon the book now before us. Its immediate and direct usefulness will, of course, be its chief recommendation to the great majority of persons; and upon this head we may allude to a few instances for the purpose of showing how far facts interesting to lawyers are touched upon in this dictionary. In the first place, then, it may be observed that it contains chronological lists of the judges of all the superior courts in England and Ireland, and the dates of a great number of interesting facts connected with their foundation and jurisdiction. We also have the dates of the enactment of various laws which are of more than usual interest and importance, and also of the decisions of famous cases, such, for instance, as the Thellusson will case. Indeed, there is a surprising amount of valuable information comprised in many of the short statements which are to be found under various legal heads. Thus under the head of Perjury, in a dozen lines, we are told something about this crime and its punishment amongst the Greeks and Romans, and under the canons of the primitive church. Then follow references to persons infamous for their perjury, amongst which we find the case of Alice Gray, who was convicted in 1856 of numerous perjuries, and then we are reminded of the Abolition of Oaths Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 60, s. 61, by which persons making a false declaration are deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour. So under the head of penal laws affecting Roman Catholics, there is contained in less than a page of small print a very compendious account under a number of different heads of all the penal laws which were repealed by the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. There are also a number of heads which are indirectly of peculiar interest and utility to lawyers. Thus under the head of Parliament we have amongst other valuable information a statement of "the number and duration of Parliaments from the 27 Ed. I., 1299, to the 22nd of Vict., 1859." We refer to these special instances in different classes of topics merely by way of illustration, as we cannot pretend to enumerate all the topics in this book which are especially interesting to lawyers. We can only say that as a book of general reference for dates, it will be found extremely useful in lawyers' offices, and for the reasons we have mentioned, it should be prized by all law students.

STATUTE LAW CONSOLIDATION.

We give the following extracts from Mr. Coode's letter to Lord Palmerston on the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills now before Parliament.

What is desired and expected under the name of consolidation of the statute law is assuredly this,—that so much of the statute law as is now found dispersed through the statute-book, should be collected together and arranged in such a way that the parts that have most connexion in meaning and effect should be most closely brought together, so that they shall throw mutual light each one on the other; that every subject, so far as the statute law affects it, should be seen in its entirety in one Act, and not as now, disjointed and dispersed in many Acts.

Thus every right—say for an instance—the right to the use of a man's body, is most clearly connected with the obligations imposed on other men to respect his liberty, and alone explains and justifies these obligations; and the clear understanding of both these, again, is indispensable for the understanding of any declaration or definition of acts diminishing his use of his body, which are wrongs, offences, or crimes, only inasmuch as they contravene those rights and obligations, and are not possibly to be conceived as wrongs, offences, or crimes, in any other way; and again, the precedent understanding of these rights, these obligations, these wrongs, is equally and absolutely indispensable for the understanding and appreciation of any appliances of the law for the protection of the right and enforcement of the obligation, whether ministerial, or preventive, or compulsive, or restitutive, or remedial, or compensatory, or penal; and of any choice of ministers, or tribunals; and of any course of procedure provided for protecting that same right or enforcing the corresponding obligations. This connexion is not merely verbal or logical, is not merely an association by resemblance; it is an actual, essential, intimate, inevitable, and indissoluble connexion, in which each part is necessary to the creation, co-existence, and intelligibility of every other. The collection from out of the chaos of the statute-book of all the provisions that affected such a right, in the order of the appropriate and subservient obligations, the prohibited wrongs, the legal protections, ministerial, civil, equitable, or penal, would be as to that particular right a perfect, self-consistent, and self-explaining consolidation of the statute law; intelligible, so far as the nature of the subject admitted of it, to every man, and affording an infallible clue to every man by which to find the statutory matter he might be in search of. The certain light, the sure test of the policy, the ready means of appreciating the usefulness of all parts of the law, which this method would afford, is what all men instinctively desire and expect who hear of a "consolidation" of the law, and this is what every good treatise on the law performs. Done by the legislature for the statute law, this work would be, so far as it went, a true consolidation—a placing together of all those parts of any subject, which make up the whole of that particular subject.

But no consolidation, in any sense of the term, is possible on the plan of these Bills—which is that of picking out the similar or identical parts from all different subjects, and stringing all those similar parts together in one Bill. Two penalties may be enacted in absolutely identical terms, but they have no connection of any kind with each other, either legal, moral, or logical, unless they protect the very same right. The penalty for assaulting a clergyman, and that for the procurement of a young woman, may, as in these Bills, be enacted in the very same words, but can have no possible connection; but the first has its proper place in immediate connection with all the other provisions of the law for the establishment and protection of religion and its ministers—the other, with all those provisions which protect the chastity and nubility of women. To pick these penalties out of their proper place is to mutilate, to destroy the integrity of the whole subjects of which they are severally the constituent legal parts. The collection of identical constituent parts must always necessarily be the destruction of the whole from which they are taken. For instance, taken and viewed apart, the spring, the balance, the dial, the hands of a watch, would be things of little significance; but seen in their mutual connection they are admirable and intelligible. A child could take off, say, the hands of hundreds of watches and could collect them into a box, but he would not by this act pretend to give these hands any connection or relationship to each other—he would not pretend to construct watches, he would be a collector of similar parts, but the destroyer of the wholes of the watches. Modellers take casts, say of the right hands of an Apollo, a Venus, a Hercules, a Gladiator, and arrange them in one place for sale, but they do not pretend that the operation of selecting and arranging similar parts is one of connecting of those parts; or that those parts so collected are so properly in place, so intelligible, or so admirable, as they were in their connection with the whole of the several figures from which they are taken. Few things are more like each other than eyes to eyes, and the eyes of one animal to those of another; but this likeness constitutes no connection of one pair of eyes with another eye or pair of eyes. Their connection is in every case with the brain behind them, and with the whole organic system of the whole animal whom they serve to warn of the proximity of objects of desire and aversion. In this connection these natural uses are understood and appreciated. But the tom-tit which plucks out the eyes of a whole aviary is unconscious of any pretensions to science or system in this selection of like parts, but obeys an instinct of undisguised destructiveness which the preparers of these Bills obey even more blindly, for they really believe that they were occupied in any constructive operation. A butcher severs shoulders of mutton as like each other as possible, and hangs them together on one line, but he does not call his arrangement a "consolidation;" he admits that he has permanently destroyed the connection which nature had made between those parts and the organic wholes from which he separated them. An Indian's collection of scalps, an African king's mound of heads, an Oriental despot's tale of right ears, are collections of similar parts, never yet commended for constructive merits, or as "consolidations." But this is the strange pretence of these Bills, that the like dilanation of whole organic subjects in law, by cutting out their penal portions and stringing them together in the form of Bills, is something logical, or systematic, or constructive, an improvement in form or order, to be accepted as "Consolidation."

A few moments' consideration will assuredly beget the conviction that there is no consolidation possible by the aggregation of similar parts; but that the collection of similar parts is necessarily destruction and disintegration of the subjects from which those parts are taken. If so, no consolidation is possible of the so-called penal law or criminal law. Twenty-eight years of effort of commissions, or committees, of both Houses of Parliament, and sixty thousand pounds of public money expended, have been made fruitless through the folly of attempting a consolidation which must be necessarily a disintegration. It is to be hoped that the evil will end here, in a mere loss of time and money, and a mere disappointment of hopes absurdly entertained, and that what is thus far no more than an idle folly, will not be converted into a permanent active mischief by carrying these Bills into law.

As Bills these things are only costly and harmless follies; but as laws they must work incalculable evil. These Bills, if passed, will be an absolute hindrance to the consolidation of all branches of the law.

They all consist exclusively of clauses, wholly unconnected the one with the other, and only brought together by the single fact that they are, every one of them, connected with a penalty. Every one of them is the penal fragment torn from its organic connection with the rights and duties, and with the other vindications with which it is legally, systematically, and logically connected. Yet although this incident of a penalty being enacted alone brings these heterogeneous provisions together—it is the almost incredible fact that the one incident which is apparent in every clause and the assumed ground for uniting them together, is itself as a whole omitted. All the provisions of the law, regulating penalties in their imposition and enforcement, are wholly left out from this series of Bills—a series of six Bills pretending to consolidate the penal law, with its one sole pervading element, penalty, in all its specific and general applications, omitted.

But if one mode of vindicating rights and enforcing duties may be thus taken out of the body of the law and made the pretence of bringing together provisions relating to every specific right and duty, there will remain no other consistent way to consolidate the fragments which will still remain, but to take all these very same rights and duties once again in connection with every other mode of vindicating them. We must have them all brought together again with the preventive vindications, again with the compulsive vindications, again with the reparatory vindications, again with the compensatory vindications, and to be consistent with this specimen of "Consolidation," we must in the Bills for the prevention of wrongs leave out the one characteristic of all the clauses, the general provisions relating to prevention, and in every other series in the same way, the one incident which alone is to act as a pretext for stringing them together.

This is, however, an assumption that the process of "Consolidation" is to be carried out consistently with this specimen, and it is certainly quite possible that it may not be carried out consistently. But this also is still more certain, that if these Bills become law, they will have mutilated and reduced to a fragment the body of law which remains relating to every subject from which its penal provisions have been dislocated into these Bills. Every subject touched by these Bills is reduced to a fragment of the subject, maimed or truncated of its penal element. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, speaking as one of the commission who prepared these Bills, assured the House of Commons that they had prepared 83 (?) other consolidating Bills. Now it is certain that every one of these other Bills relating to any matter enforced in any respect by any penalty, must have been either maimed or lopped of its penal element, and so have been only a fragment of a subject, or it must have contained these penal provisions over again—a strange operation of "Consolidation." It might, if this could be doubted, be worth your lordship's while to examine some of these other "Consolidations," when their maimed and dismembered appearance would assuredly show the injury inflicted on the whole of them by the dislocation of their penal members into these Bills.

But this effect is more easily to be seen in the operation these Bills have on various Acts recently passed at the instance of yourself and your present colleagues in the Government, who will be well able to judge of the usefulness of the operation. In the seventh Bill of the series, the "Criminal Statutes Repeal," this effect can be seen at a glance. Thus the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 23, contains forty-two perfectly well-connected sections for redeeming and commuting South Sea and other Annuities, for creating new annuities, and issuing Exchequer Bonds, with all necessary incidental provisions for giving course, value and trustworthiness to these instruments,—amongst others, one penal clause, the 41st, making the forgery of them a felony, quite in its proper place and connection, where its use and effect can be most easily seen and judged of. But these Bills take out this 41st section, placing it in a Bill with all other heterogeneous forgeries, and leaving the original Act a mutilated fragment of forty-one clauses. The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, is an Act to substitute other punishments in lieu of transportation. It consists of sixteen clauses, all of which relate exclusively to penal matters, and would seem to have been proper to include wholly in a series of Bills exclusively penal. But these Bills only take out and repeal the 12th section, leaving the remainder of the Act a lopped fragment of fifteen clauses. The Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 132, extending the provisions of cap. 23, is maimed in the like manner of two well-connected sections, quite in their natural place—being left a fragment of nine sections. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 33, places public statues in the metropolis under the control of the Commissioners of Works, and section six makes the damaging of such statues a misdemeanor. This section is taken away from its well-connected place, and the Act is left a fragment of six remaining sections.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS, 1860.

We are indebted to Mr. W. B. Roberts, solicitor, of Usk, for the following tabular statement, which has recently been compiled by him, for the most part, out of the last official returns on Civil and Criminal Statistics.

Total number of prisoners for debt and under civil process (including 639 women)	11,707

Bills and informations filed in the year were	2,209
Claims and special cases	48
Administration summonses filed (p. 157)	412
Other summonses	362

Total of the above 3,031

The fees collected by the Clerk of the Records were £25,107

The total amount of the taxed bills of costs was £785,262

And the fees paid in the taxing office were . . . £23,873

As many as 7,065 bills were taxed.

In the Accountant's office the total number of accounts are 22,757, and the fees paid in the office were £684. The receipts in accounts passed, in lunacy of committees and receivers, amounted to £331,594, and disbursements and allowances to £287,497. Certificates of payment of money and transfer of stock, &c., in court were for £169,333.

The amount of cash, securities, and other effects paid and transferred into the office of the Accountant-General in Chancery, in the year ending October, 1860, amounted to £14,707,912; and the amount of cash and securities paid and transferred out of court to £14,487,632. The total number of cheques signed was 40,046.

The number of accounts passed (others than receivers' accounts) was 1,138; the receipts therein, £6,705,593, and the disbursements and allowances £6,212,661.

The number of receivers' accounts was 476; the receipts therein, £1,035,106; and the disbursements and allowances therein, £858,701.

The sum of £1,598,157 was realised on the sale of estates, under the orders of the Court.

In the Probate Court the total number of probates granted was 8,542, and of letters of administration 5,473. The fees are estimated at £1,868. The total amount of taxed costs was £15,557.

In the District Probate Courts the number of probates was 14,005, and of letters of administration 6,160. The total amount of fees received in the forty probate districts was £56,007, and amount of duty for stamps £480,256.

The number of persons declared bankrupts in the year was 1,430, of these 1,028 passed their last examination; the total amount of their debts, on their balance sheets, was £4,478,037, of which £1,249,962 was realised by the Court. The solicitors, assignees, brokers, &c., charges amounted to £316,347, or £33 11s. 2d. per cent. The average of the dividend in the Manchester Bankrupt Court was £47 7s. 5d., and at Bristol £12 1s. 11d.

In the year 1860, 2,820 petitions of insolvency were filed by imprisoned debtors, of which 820 were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of London. The dividends on the estates averaged £5 11s. per cent. The number of petitions for protection filed in 1860 was 3,081, and of these 1,055 were in the London jurisdiction. The number of such petitions in 1859 was 2,820. The amount of scheduled debts in the Insolvent Court cases was £365,766, and in County Court cases £169,846. Under the Protection Acts the debts in the London district were £51,737, and in the County Court districts £176,116.

Number of plaints entered	714,562	782,384
Sued for	£1,754,971	£1,882,047
Judgments entered for	£851,732	£902,739
Costs exclusive of fees	£37,628	£38,302
Fees	£215,623	£226,738
Fees (1855) before reduction	£228,720
Judgments for plaintiffs	285,984	296,719
— for defendants	9,089	9,175
Juries	988	894
Nonsuits	8,861	8,867
Writs of certiorari	135	126

There were 8,911 plaints entered for sums above £20, and judgments entered in 3,655 of such cases.

The number of judgment summonses issued was 112,313; heard, 50,838; warrants of committal issued, 22,399; and actual imprisonments, 6,955.

The warrants issued in 1858 were, 30,756; and of committals, 10,748.

The number of executions against the goods in 1860 was 109,366; and of actual sales, 3,973.

There were 17 appeals to the Superior Courts; charitable trust orders, 133; protection orders to wives registered, 611.

	Plaints.	Sued for fees above £50	Causes
Bristol Tolzey Court . .	448	£12,844	£246 11
Liverpool Passage Court . .	3,340	56,667	1,723 245
London Sheriffs' Court . .	9,970	42,911	4,265 58*
Manchester Record Court	3,881	51,050	1,705 247*
Derby Borough Court . .	103	1,667	1,116 8*
Salford Court of Record. .	2,218	25,307	958 164*

* Above £20 and under £50.

The fees of the Derby Borough Court are represented to be not far short of the amount of the debts sued for. As it has survived nearly all similar courts it is perhaps, at Derby, a popular court, and is apparently well sustained.

On circuit 24, there were 17,418 plaints, and 255 above £20. The total amount of money sued for was £48,285. Protection cases, 57.

On circuit 30 there were 20,430 plaints entered and £49,481 sued for. The number of causes above £20 was 289. Protection cases, 47.

There were nine orders for the protection of wives registered on circuit 24, and four orders registered on circuit 30.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. FREDERICK WEST, SOLICITOR.—

At the 21st anniversary dinner of the Stationers and Paper Makers Provident Society, held at the Albion Tavern on the 17th inst., a handsome testimonial was presented to Mr. Frederick West, of No. 3, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, Solicitor, the honorary secretary of the society. In the course of the evening Mr. George Chater (the treasurer of the society), addressing Mr. West, said he felt a pleasure in presenting, in the name of their friends, a small token of their esteem of his private worth and valuable aid during the period he had fulfilled the duties of hon. secretary. He could bear witness to his kindness of manners, and untiring zeal in the cause. He trusted the present would be accepted only as a sincere token of their esteem. The testimonial consisted of a handsome silver centre-piece, the design of which was as follows:—A tripod panelled vase enriched with vine leaves and grapes, supporting three frosted figures representing "Wisdom," "Liberalism," and "Religion." The stem of twisted vine, with canopy of vine and grapes overhanging the figures, surmounted by a trellis-basket holding a cut-glass bowl. One side of the vase contained the arms of Mr. West, another side the arms of the Stationers' Company, while a third bore the following inscription:—"Presented with two epergnes, on the 17th July, 1861, to Frederick West, Esq., by several friends, as a token of their high esteem for his private worth, and to mark their sense of his urbanity and kindness, as well as his untiring zeal and ability with which he has discharged the duties of Honorary Secretary for a period of ten years to the Stationers and Paper Manufacturers' Provident Society.—John Dickenson, Esq., F.R.S., President; George Chater, Esq., Treasurer." Mr. West returned thanks in a feeling speech. The two silver epergnes corresponded with the centre-piece, the whole forming an extremely handsome testimonial.

At a meeting of the town council of Canterbury, held on the 24th instant, Mr. Herbert Tritton Sankey, of this city, solicitor, was unanimously elected clerk of the peace for the city and borough, in the room of Mr. John Nutt, who had resigned.

CURRENT TOPICS.

We are not in the habit of making any boastful parade of the eulogies, which, from time to time, have fallen from the Bench, as to the character and value of the reports contained in the Weekly Reporter. So many expressions of approval, not only of the speed with which cases are reported there, but also of their accuracy, have been heard, both from the Bench and at the Bar, that these reports are now received with favour in all the Common Law and Equity Courts of this country, and also of our various colonies. Last week, this journal contained, under the heading of "Foreign Tribunals," a report of an important criminal appeal which was argued by Mr. Chisholm Anstey before the Supreme Court of Bombay, and it will be seen there that the argument proceeded mainly upon cases cited from our publication, and that the Chief Justice referred for an authority to one of our volumes, in a manner which showed that he held it in high regard, and was in the habit of reading the cases reported in it. In the present number of the Weekly Reporter, the Master of the Rolls, referring to the report of a case recently decided by him, and which appeared some months ago in the columns of the Weekly Reporter, was pleased to express himself as follows:—"I have been referred to a case of Lewis v. Duncombe, reported in the 9th volume of the Weekly Reporter, 446, and which I have found, in common with other cases which have come under my observation, very accurately reported in the Weekly Reporter." We think it due to the gentleman to whom we are indebted for the reports of cases in his Honour's Court, to mention the high commendation which he has thus received from the learned judge presiding there. From the establishment of the Weekly Reporter, its aim has been to produce not only speedy but reliable reports, and so to supersede on the one hand the dilatory and very expensive publications of the official reporters, and on the other, the almost equally slow and most unsatisfactory productions of the legal journals—which were too frequently little else than uncorrected prints of the transcripts of the short-hand writers' notes. The very large circulation and judicial sanction which our reports have received, combine to give the profession the best testimony of the extent of our success; and the manner in which they are accepted by judges of the superior courts is the best authority that a country practitioner need desire in citing them before local tribunals.

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, minus the excrescence of a Chief Judge and New Appeal Court, has at length got through all its difficulties, and in a few days will be part of our statute book. We shall, with as little delay as possible, bring out an edition of the new statute, for which we have already engaged the services of a competent editor, who is now employed upon the work. We shall also publish an edition of the several Criminal Law Consolidation Acts. The object of the latter work will be not to encroach upon the proper province, or to appropriate the labours, of such authors as Roscoe and Archbold, but to make their existing works readily available for reference under the new Criminal Code. As the new Acts will in fact be little more than a mere consolidation of existing enactments, our edition will of course point out the sources from which the new statutes have been derived.

Where any alterations have been made they will be noted and their effect shown; and all the important recent cases will be cited under the heads to which they properly belong. We have been fortunate in obtaining for this arduous and important undertaking the services of three members of the Bar, whose names will be a sufficient guarantee for the character of the proposed work, of which we shall give a more detailed account as soon as the editors have made a little more progress in it.

Before another week elapses all our courts will have risen for the long vacation, and we shall of necessity be very soon deprived of the opportunity of offering any comments upon their decisions in recent cases. We intend, however, to offer our readers by way of supplement to our series of papers upon the recent decisions of the courts of common law and equity, a commentary upon some of the more important judgments of the House of Lords, during the session which is now drawing to a close. Questions of law solemnly argued before that supreme tribunal, and expressly settled by it, have something like the force of Parliamentary enactment, and definitely decide what the law is until it is altered by Act of Parliament, or until the House of Lords itself declares the law to be otherwise, if, indeed, it has power to do so—a point which our readers are aware remains after much mooted not free from doubt.

The number of important cases which have been decided by the House of Lords during the present session is not very great; but a few of them are of considerable practical interest, and these we shall discuss at some length in this series.

The most important judgment of the House of Lords during this session was in the case of Bristow v. Whitmore, 9 W. R. 621. The question there was whether the master of a ship who while he was abroad entered into certain charter-parties with the Admiralty, for the conveyance to England of troops at a specified rate—he undertaking to supply provisions, &c.—was entitled as against the mortgagees to be recouped out of monies paid into court by the Admiralty the sums expended by him in furnishing provisions, &c., according to the charter-parties. In this case the decree of Vice-Chancellor Wood was overturned by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, but re-established in the House of Lords; and the case itself is one of great importance as regarding the position and rights of captains or masters of ships, and the distinction between acts done by a master as agent for the owner of the vessel and acts done by the master in his capacity of master. Upon this topic we shall have some observations to offer.

Another important decision was in the case of Thompson v. Webster (9 W. R. 641). The case related to an alleged voluntary settlement, and raised the question whether it was void as against creditors, under the provisions of 13 Eliz. c. 5. The decision was that the Court must decide in each particular case whether, under all the circumstances, the intention of the settlor was to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors.

Lord Braybrooke v. The Attorney-General (9 W. R. 601) affects the construction of a clause in the Succession Duty Act, and raises a discussion upon the technical force of the words "disposition" and "devolution" contained in the Act.

Hindmarsh v. Charlton (9 W. R. 521) was heard upon an appeal from the Probate Court, and is important in reference to the execution of wills and their attestation and the subscription of witnesses to them.

These cases, and one or two others, will form the subject of remark in our proposed commentary, which we shall commence forthwith.

The case of Bartley v. Hodges, which was decided in the Court of Queen's Bench on the 4th of June last, and reported 9 W. R. 693, is one of considerable interest to persons connected with our colonies. The decision has already called forth the following observations from a Canadian law contemporary:—

It is not often that we find decisions of English courts of justice of especial interest to the colonies. When any such present themselves we endeavour to make them known through the pages of the Upper Canada Law Journal.

The decision of the English Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Anderson, is the latest case of the kind to which we have hitherto found it necessary to refer.

One of less exciting interest, but not of less direct effect upon colonial interests, is Bartley v. Hodges (9 W. R. 693). In it the Court held that a discharge to an insolvent or bankrupt, under a colonial statute, is not binding upon his English creditors not resident or domiciled in the colony.

The proposition, though startling, is not without some show of reason to support it. It is not, however, for us at present to argue the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the decision, but to announce the fact of the decision.

When we consider that colonial merchants are in general more or less indebted to English houses, the importance of the decision cannot be over-rated. The effect of it may be to render necessary an imperial bankruptcy or insolvency law.

The aim of every good system of bankruptcy or insolvency is to relieve the honest debtor from all his past liabilities. No colonial act can, according to the decision mentioned, have that effect as against English creditors resident and domiciled out of Canada.

It is well that this point of law has been at the present time determined. There is among us a strong desire for some effective system of bankruptcy and insolvency law; and the question at once arises, whether, under existing circumstances, we should be content with one enacted by our own Legislature merely.

In connexion with the case reported we may mention that it has, we believe, been held in our Court of Chancery that a bankruptcy vesting order, granted by a subordinate judicial officer in Scotland, under an imperial statute, is effectual in Canada, so as to pass real estate, &c., situate in Canada, to an assignee appointed by such officer.

This state of the law is really vexatious. It is unjust that a sheriff or sheriff's deputy in Scotland, or any foreign dominion, should have power materially to affect the interests of a great body of creditors in this colony in a matter where they are not consulted, and where it would be next to impossible to tender advice or offer opposition if deemed necessary, upon notice of the intended proceedings.

In Bartley v. Hodges, the question arose upon a bill of exchange which was accepted by the defendant in England previously to his going out to Victoria. He there submitted to the statute of that colony which was passed for the relief of insolvent debtors, according to which it appears a sequestration by the Colonial Court carries all the insolvent's property in whatever country situate; and it was, therefore, argued that his creditors, wherever they might be resident, or wherever the debts might have been contracted, would be bound by the certificate of the Colonial Court. There have been some decisions of our courts that where the discharge of a bankrupt or insolvent has taken place under colonial law, it has bound the creditors in this country; but in these cases, as was pointed out by Mr. Justice Wightman in Bartley v. Hodges, the law giving the discharge was in fact the enactment of the imperial legislature; and not that of the legislature of a colony. There has been no such decision under any Act passed by a Colonial Parliament; and the question now arises, whether the consent of the English Parliament ought not to be obtained for all such colonial statutes as those relating to bankruptcy, and enactments of a similar kind, to which it is desirable to give effect throughout the empire.

The claims of the poor Military Knights of Windsor have at length received some attention from the Legislature. The hardship of their case induced the House of Commons to agree to an address to the Crown, which resulted in the filing of an ex officio information by the Attorney-General against the Dean and Canons of Windsor. Upon the hearing of the case, Sir J. Romilly, M.R., held that the whole of the improved rents of the foundation, amounting now to £14,000 a year, belonged to the Dean and Canons, whilst the Poor Knights were entitled to receive out of the fund only the sums fixed by the original grant. This decision was affirmed by the House of Lords in June last year; see The Attorney-General v. The Dean and Canons of Windsor, 8 W.R. 477. To remedy in some degree the practical injustice caused by this state of the law, a Bill now before Parliament provides that the proceeds of one of the eight suspended canonries are henceforth to be received by the dean and chapter and applied by them for the benefit of the knights as the Crown shall direct. An attempt was made by the Earl of Chichester on the part of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, when the Bill was in committee in the House of Lords, on Thursday, to have the costs of the Dean and Chapter in the litigation paid out of some State fund, but the suggestion was opposed by the Lord Chancellor, and negatived.

THE DOMICIL BILLS.

The Law of Domicil has sustained two assaults of no ordinary force in the present session of Parliament. The enormous expense and protracted litigation which the difficulty of ascertaining, first, the fact of domicil, and, secondly, the law applicable to such a place, as illustrated by Lord v. Colvin, 7 W. R. 251, and Bremerv. Freeman, ante, p. 467, has imperatively demanded that a legislative effort should be made to lighten the inconveniences attendant upon British subjects who make their wills abroad. The Foreign Law Ascertainment Act has been intended to render the proof of foreign laws and customs more easy, certain, and cheap than it is at present, and to remove one of the difficulties inherent in the present Law of Domicil. The object of Lord Kingsdown's Bill, of which we gave a detailed account, ante, p. 467, and which is now in committee in the Commons, after having been passed by the Lords, is to supersede the necessity of a resort to the Law of Domicil in very many cases. The merits and defects of this Bill we shall endeavour to recapitulate briefly. It assimilates the English Law of Domicil and the code of continental Europe, in allowing the lex loci, as well as the lex domicilii, to govern the forms of the execution of wills, so that a conformity to either of such codes will render a will valid; and this is the present international law of Europe; and it is still further indulgent to testators in suffering them to execute their wills abroad, according to the laws of England or of Scotland. That Bill, however, is defective, inasmuch as it applies only to the forms of execution, and not to the interpretation of wills, and has no respect to cases of intestacy. These are left, as hitherto, to the operation of the Law of Domicil. An objection has been urged with copious, but inconclusive arguments in the Saturday Review of June 28, against this Bill, on the ground that it involves a breach of the comity of nations. We showed, however, ante, p. 467, that the Law of Domicil, so far as it has any specific operation of its own, involves a sacrifice of territorial law to private right and convenience, assuming, as it does, that testators are more likely to be acquainted with the laws of their domicil than with the laws of any particular country where they may happen for the moment to sojourn, or to have had commercial transactions or debts due to them. Conventions are often necessary for states, as regards public international law; but, except as regards legacy or other fiscal duties, questions relating to domicil seldom admit of grounds for international jealousy. The Lord Chancellor's Bill, however, which is now before Parliament, proceeds on the assumption that conventions with foreign states are necessary to alter the international Law of Domicil. It takes up the question where Lord Kingsdown's Bill left it, and endeavours to secure a definition of domicil that may be resorted to in all cases of the intestacy of British subjects resident abroad.

The first section of Lord Westbury's Bill provides that no British subject who shall die in a foreign country is to be deemed to have acquired a domicile in such country unless he shall have had a permanent residence there for one year immediately preceding his or her decease, and shall also have deposited in a public office in such foreign country a declaration in writing of his or her intention to become domiciled in such foreign country; otherwise, he or she is to "be deemed for all purposes of testate or intestate succession as to moveables, to retain the domicile he or she possessed at the time of his or her going to reside in such foreign country." This and the subsequent provisions, however, are not to have any operation, except as regards those States with which her Majesty shall have entered into a convention for these purposes. The result of the convention is to be declared by an order in council, which is also to specify the office in the foreign country in which the declaration as to domicile is to be lodged.—The Attorney-General stated in the debate on this Bill, that the phrase "permanent residence for one year" was commented upon as involving a solecism. Although we profess to be merely juridical, and not linguistic, critics, and have no desire to usurp the province of quarterly reviewers, yet, we must say that the phrase is in our opinion hardly exceptionable. The second section is the converse of the first, and provides that no subject of a foreign State with which a convention of the nature before-mentioned shall have been entered into, who dies in the United Kingdom, shall be deemed to have acquired a British or Irish domicile unless he shall have been a resident in the British Isles for one year previously, and have lodged a declaration such as is described in the first section. The third section exempts from the operation of the Act foreigners who have obtained letters of naturalization in any part of her Majesty's dominions. The obtaining of such letters appears to be regarded in this Bill as tantamount to the acquisition of a British domicile. The domicile of these persons may, however, if the Bill become law, be as uncertain as ever. Like droits of admiralty expense may be incurred in the ascertainment of their position, whether it be above the high or low water mark of that ever-fluctuating state of facts of which the Law of Domicil takes cognizance. The last section of the Bill directs that, after a convention has been concluded and an order in council issued, such as are described in the first section, if the subject of any foreign State which shall have been party to such convention, shall die within her Majesty's dominions, and there shall be no person present at the time of such death who shall be rightfully entitled to administer to the estate of such deceased person, the consuls of such foreign States may obtain "administration of the effects of such deceased person, limited in such manner and for such time as to such Court shall seem fit." This limitation appears to us to be altogether unnecessary; and, moreover, to prohibit the Court of Probate from giving the consuls any but a limited administration even of the effects left by such deceased person within British dominions, although such evidently could not have been the intention of the framer of the Bill. We may illustrate our meaning by the Act regarding illusory appointments. It was intended to render such appointments valid when made; but it did more; it renders them necessary to be made, notwithstanding that the interests allotted by them may be of the most trivial value. It may, of course, be contended in behalf of this section that it is merely a disclaimer of a foreign jurisdiction in our courts, which are thus empowered to give administration of the effects of deceased persons to the consuls of foreign states. But such a disclaimer is wholly unnecessary; and as the words of the Bill must receive some meaning and force, they appear to us to authorise only a limited administration of the effects left by deceased foreigners within her Majesty's dominions. The passage, also, as to there being "no person present at the time of such death who shall be rightfully entitled to administer" sounds strangely as a specimen of legislative draftsmanship. We agree, therefore, with Mr. Rolt that the Bill is ill-drawn, though we cannot consider it as useless as he does.

Lord Kingsdown's and Lord Westbury's Bills are intimately connected in meaning, as the preceding account shows. The object of both Bills is to remove the difficulties that are at present attendant upon all questions of domicile. Lord Kingsdown's Bill renders a will independent of the domicile of the testator, and, moreover, confers other boons upon British subjects making their wills abroad. That measure is, therefore, most valuable. If a testator is in all cases deemed by the law as inops consilii; a testator who is making his will in a distant or a foreign land is a fortiori entitled to consideration. We have already commented so fully upon this Bill that we need add nothing more here. Although connected in principle with the Lord Chancellor's Bill, it need not be laid aside, if the latter be rejected. The object of Lord Westbury's Bill is to facilitate the proof of domicile in all administration cases in which such proof shall become necessary, that is, in all cases of the intestacy of persons who may be alleged to have had a foreign domicile. The former Bill excludes the Law of Domicil altogether as the standard for the execution of wills. Lord Westbury, on the other hand, intends to render the hitherto complicated law easy of proof, whenever it must be taken into consideration, as in cases of intestacy. Both Bills, therefore, cover the whole domain of successions to persons dying abroad, the former as to testacy, the latter as to intestacy. The latter Bill makes even a greater change in the Law of Domicil than the former. Lord Kingsdown's Bill does not affect the course of the devolution of property; Lord Westbury's Bill does. By altering the Law of Domicil as to the distribution of the estates of intestates, it may often disappoint the intention of such persons. Lord Kingsdown's Bill is based upon the true principles of testamentary law; it never can defeat the intention of a testator, and the only objection of weight that has been urged against it is, that it gives testators too much latitude—a view that appears to us to be wholly untenable. The objections brought against it by the Saturday Review, on the ground that it does not sufficiently respect the law of nations, having been already answered by us need not be repeated with the answers here. The Lord Chancellor's Bill, however, appears to attribute some force to such objections, and is, indeed, sufficiently secured against them.

The chief defect in Lord Westbury's Bill is the complicated machinery of conventions, upon a resort to which the operation of the Bill is made to depend. The Foreign Law Ascertainment Act, upon which we commented ante, p. 521, authorises a resort to conventions; but it has grounds for such adjuncts, which the present Bill has not. That statute is virtually retroactive in its operation. If, for instance, a case, such as Bremer v. Freeman, should occur hereafter, the convention could be entered into, and the case remitted to the foreign court for advice almost simultaneously. But, unless a convention should have been entered into with the foreign State in which a British subject shall die to whom the succession is disputed, prior to his death, it cannot be entered into afterwards, so as to affect the law applicable to such a case. Are conventions, then, to be entered into prospectively with every State on the face of the globe? Indeed, we may ask, what probability is there that any, or, at all events, that many such conventions will ever be made? Another objection to the Bill is, that persons sojourning abroad who would be so attentive to the question of their domicile, would be more likely to make or re-publish their wills, than lodge the declaration specified in this Bill, and so they would come within the provisions of Lord Kingsdown's Bill. If, however, they should, with nomadic insouciance, which is not unlikely, omit to lodge the declaration, they would continue to be under the operation of the law of domicile. Besides presuming the concurrence of foreign powers and the observance of the prescribed formality, the Lord Chancellor's Bill may, if it become law, avoid wills that would be good at present. Its restrictive operation in this respect, however, will, if it together with Lord Kingsdown's Bill become law, be confined to wills which do not comply with the requirements either of the lex loci or of the law of England or of Scotland. If a testator be so completely heedless, legislation will do him but little service. Viewed as a matter of fact, and apart from possible, but very unlikely, contingencies, a will made by a British subject abroad, if ordinary care has been bestowed upon it, is sure to conform either to the requirements of the law of England or Scotland, or of the lex loci, as the wills of such are usually drawn either by the testators themselves or by practitioners of the locality where they are executed. Such wills are rendered secure by Lord Kingsdown's Bill, and, therefore, will remain valid, even though they receive no benefit from Lord Westbury's. Although the two Bills relate to the same subject matter, they are distinct, and nowise dependant on each other for an effective operation. The Lord Chancellor's Bill, although it certainly grapples with the whole Law of Domicil, is so cumbrous in its mechanism of conventions, as not likely to become law this session. We should, however, willingly see it enacted, after its phraseology shall have been somewhat amended. Together with Lord Kingsdown's Bill, it will afford ample protection to the successors of British testators and intestates who shall have been resident abroad. But Lord Kingsdown's Bill is certainly the measure of paramount importance. It will confer an additional value on the Bill of the Lord Chancellor if it shall become law, and even if it be rejected this session, it is to be hoped that at all events Lord Kingsdown's measure may even yet be carried.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

July 25.—The Registrars' Office.—Mr. Bevir applied to his lordship on behalf of several firms of solicitors under the following circumstances:—The applicants had deposited at the office of the registrars various orders, to which the proper stamps were attached, but a junior clerk in the registrar's office had removed the stamps for the purpose of disposing of them for his own private use. Upon application at the office, the solicitors had been refused permission to take away the orders until fresh stamps had been affixed. The applicants asked that the loss occasioned by the defaulting clerk might be borne by the fee fund.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the proper course would be to direct an enquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case, and as the solicitors were not to blame in the matter, he should hold them harmless, if he possessed the power and could satisfy himself out of what fund to order the loss to be paid.

Inquiry directed accordingly.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

July 27.—Business of the Court.—The Court rose to-day for the vacation. The following summary will show the amount of business which has been transacted since the last vacation. From the sitting of the Court at the beginning of the last Michaelmas Term until its rising to-day, the Judge-Ordinary has dissolved 164 marriages, has pronounced ten decrees of judicial separation, and two declarations of nullity, and has dismissed 25 petitions. He has thus tried and determined 201 divorce suits; 59 probate causes and two legitimacy declaration causes have been disposed of within the same period. One of the former, Talbot v. Traherne, occupied 11, and one of the latter, Miss Shedden's case, occupied 14 days. These figures do not, of course, include the numerous interlocutory applications which are heard every Wednesday.

At the beginning of Trinity Term the divorce list contained 153 causes, of which the Court has disposed of 76 sitting alone, and of 33 with the assistance of juries. Several of the others have been postponed or withdrawn by the parties, and the actual arrears are therefore not above 30, and about 40 new cases have been set down for trial next term.

The Act of last session, giving the Judge Ordinary power to try cases over which the full Court alone had jurisdiction before it was passed, has thus, it will be seen, already cleared off almost all the arrears; and the fact that in some of the cases lately decided, the petitions were not filed until December, 1860, shows that it has also removed all ground of complaint on account of delay in the trial of causes after they are ready for hearing.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, on rising to address the House on this Bill, contrasted the public discussion which the Bill had received in the House of Commons with the private consideration given it by the Select Committee of the House of Lords. He then adverted to the inconsistent conduct of the Conservatives in the Lower House, who supported the measure, with that of the Conservative party in the House of Lords, who had pursued an opposite course of action, and begged that the decision to be pronounced on that Bill might be founded, not on party motives, but on the intrinsic merits or demerits of the measure. He denied that the appointment of a chief judge could be termed "a job," but declared himself solely responsible for such a job, if job it were. He then briefly showed the defects of the present system, explained what changes were necessary, and defended the means by which such changes were proposed to be made. The appointment of a chief judge would remedy the present confusion of administrative and judicial duties, by introducing an officer to superintend the administrative part of the business, and at the same time to exercise a jurisdiction partly appellate and partly original. By such an appointment, also, justice would be rendered more quickly and more cheaply, and the bandying of suitors from one court to another would be avoided. To render, however, these reforms complete and the Court of Bankruptcy self-sufficient, he contended that the Court should be one of appeal, and pointed out the fallaciousness of the arguments that the number of appeals in bankruptcy being comparatively few, therefore, no judge of appeal was necessary. Certificates, as tests of character, would be made of some value if a judge were appointed, as they would be distinguished by a uniformity of decision. In conclusion, he objected to the appeals in bankruptcy being referred to the Lords Justices of Appeal, as those functionaries had quite as much as they could do without being saddled with additional burdens, and he begged their lordships to agree with the House of Commons in their rejection of their lordships' amendments.

Lord CRANWORTH said he did not object to the series of abstract propositions stated by the Lord Chancellor, but would have preferred to have heard it proved that the officer proposed to be appointed was necessary. His lordship then explained the mode of proceeding in bankruptcy, and contended that the present commissioners were in every way qualified to act as judges, and protested against the appointment of an unnecessary judge for the purpose of hearing appeals. The Bill was almost silent as to the jurisdiction of the chief judge, and dwelt far too much in generalities and not enough in particulars. He believed the appointment of a chief judge was not necessary, and was therefore objectionable.

Lord CHELMSFORD replied to the insinuations of the Lord Chancellor against the "Select Committee," and vindicated the decisions of that committee as frank and entirely removed from party motives, and stated his opinion that the appointment of a chief judge was unnecessary, as the duties which he would have to do were efficiently performed by those to whom they were now entrusted. He refuted the assertion that the Lords Justices of Appeal were overburdened with work by quoting the number of appeal cases heard by the Lords Justices, and denied that the proposed changes would be less expensive than the system now in use, for he believed that they would tend to increased cost by augmenting the number of appeals. His lordship then showed that the original jurisdiction which the Bill pretended to confer on the chief judge was nothing but a pretence for making an appointment, and he therefore hoped the House would adhere to its amendments, and spare the public the expense of a most unnecessary appointment.

Lord WENSLEYDALE agreed with the opinions expressed by Lords Cranworth and Chelmsford.

The LORD CHANCELLOR having replied to the objections of Lords Cranworth and Chelmsford,

The House divided on the question that this House do insist on its amendments as far as relates to the office, power, and duties of the chief judge, when the numbers were:—

Contents	80
Not-contents	46

Their lordships' amendment was therefore adhered to.

A discussion then ensued as to whether their lordships should insist upon their amendment with respect to the creditors' assignees. On the question being put the "Not-contents" were declared to have it; so that the Commons' amendment on this point was agreed to. After further discussion the other amendments of the Commons were agreed to, and a committee was appointed to prepare a statement of the reasons why their lordships had insisted on their own amendments.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

SALMON FISHERIES BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

Thursday, August 1.

CRIMINAL RELIEF OATHS BILL.

The royal assent was given to this Bill.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

The Accessories and Abettors, Criminal Statutes Repeal, Larceny, &c., Malicious Injuries to Property, Forgery, Coinage Offences, and Offences against the Person Bills, severally passed through committee, and were reported, without amendments, to the House.

WINDSOR SUSPENDED CANONRIES BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

The Earl of CHICHESTER said the Bill would accomplish two very desirable objects,—it would increase the inadequate stipends of the Military Knights of Windsor, and augment two livings in the town of Windsor. With regard to the first object, the claim of the knights was resisted by the Dean and Chapter, and the decision of the Master of the Rolls in favour of the Dean and Chapter, was, on appeal, confirmed by their lordships. Several thousand pounds had been expended by the Dean and Chapter in costs, and he thought some provision ought to be inserted in the Bill by which they might be reimbursed that outlay.

Lord KINGSDown said that although on the question of law the Dean and Chapter of Windsor were right, there never was a case of greater hardship than that of the Military Knights of Windsor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that to provide for the costs of the Dean and Chapter would be to override the decision of the Master of the Rolls and of their Lordships' House.

The Bill was reported without amendments.

Friday, August 2.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTE LAWS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill for further consolidating the statute laws. He did not do so with the idea of proceeding with the measure this session, but merely that it might be read a first time, in order to receive the consideration of their lordships previous to the next meeting of Parliament. The bill dealt with the Acts from the earliest dates, and continued down to those passed in the reign of Edward III.; in short, it dealt with all the Acts mentioned in the first folio volume published by the Record Commission. The effect of the Bill would be to reduce the volume to about one-fifth of its present size.

The Bill was read a first time.

Friday, July 26.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING (MONEY) BILL.

The order of the day for proceeding with this Bill was discharged. This Bill, therefore, will not be further proceeded with this session.

Monday, July 29.

LAW OF DOMICILE.

WILLS OF PERSONALTY OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving that the House go into committee on the Wills and Domicile of British Subjects Abroad Bill, said, the few observations he had to make on this Bill he would extend to the next order (Wills of Personality Bill) as the measures had a good deal in common. Having stated the object of the first Bill, he said that the Bill which stood next on the paper to the measure before the House, and which had come down from the Lords (the Wills and Personality of British Subjects Abroad Bill) had for its object to put an end to the law that the validity of the will should depend on the law of the domicile of the testator. If, however, the first Bill should pass, it would very much mitigate the evil that might result from the doubt and difficulty of defining what constituted domicile, because there would then be an authoritative declaration of domicile ratified by convention with foreign Governments. The Bill from the Lords would, he thought, introduce mischief and danger greater than that which it was intended to remedy. He then proceeded to shew the probable effect of that Bill, and suggested to the hon. and learned gentleman who had charge of the Bill (Sir F. Kelly) that as the Bill now before the House was admitted on all hands to make an advantageous change in the law, and as it facilitated future legislation, the hon. and learned gentleman should consent to postpone to another session the Wills and Personality of British Subjects Abroad Bill. He then moved that the House go into committee on the Bill.

Sir F. KELLY said that the Bill which his learned friend asked him to withdraw had been proposed in the other House by Lord Kingsdown; referred there to a select committee, by whom it was subjected to a searching consideration; was in the end unanimously approved, and passed the House of Lords with the entire approbation of the ministers in that House. He then stated the grievances arising from the present state of the law. The Bill proposed by the Attorney-General was a measure enacting that a treaty or convention should be entered into between this country and other nations providing that no one should acquire a domicile in a foreign country except by a residence for one year immediately before his death, and by the registration of his intention in some public office. The object of the Bill which had been introduced by Lord Kingsdown was, on the other hand, plain and clear. It proposed to make wills valid which were framed according to the laws of England or of Scotland, in accordance with the law of the country in which they were made, or in conformity with the law of the country in which the testator had his domicile. So far, however, as the Bill of the late Attorney-General was concerned, he ventured to contend that its advantages, if it were found to confer any, would be contingent. He should not, however, object to going into committee upon it if the House were disposed to do so.

Sir G. BOWYER strongly objected to the Attorney-General's Bill, which he said was not founded upon any principle that could be understood by any legal mind. He moved to defer the committee for three months.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL observed that there was nothing in either of the Bills which conflicted with the other, and pointed out the advantages that would result from passing the Attorney-General's Bill, if foreign nations would co-operate with us, and there was no reason, he said, to doubt that they would do so. The passing of the other Bill would leave untouched many of the evils under the existing state of the law.

Objections were urged by Mr. Rolt, Mr. Malins, and Sir H. Cairns, to the Bill immediately before the House, and after a short reply by the Attorney-General, the amendment was withdrawn, the House went into committee upon the Bill, and afterwards upon the Lords' Bill, both of which passed the committee.

PROSECUTIONS EXPENSES BILL.

On the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading of this Bill, Sir G. C. LEWIS said he had brought in this Bill to satisfy some of the northern counties. As, however, it did not appear to have given satisfaction, he should best discharge his duty by withdrawing it.

The order of the day was then discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Tuesday, July 30.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

This Bill passed through committee.

Wednesday, July 31.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

This Bill was withdrawn.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

Colonel FRENCH moved that this Bill should be read that day three months.

Mr. BOVILL seconded the motion.

The House was cleared for a division, but no member of the Government having spoken in opposition to the motion when the question was put a second time, it was carried, and the further progress of the Bill arrested.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the consideration of the Lords' reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to this Bill, to which the Commons had disagreed.

The clerk at the table then read the reasons as follows:—

"The lords insist upon such parts of their amendments in the preamble to clause 1, and in clauses 2, 3, 4, 13, 14, 18, 22, 23, 33, 37, 39, 43, 52, 55, 56, 57, 59, 60, 61, 63, 67, 68, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 83, 99, 111, 112, 129, 142, 164, 169, 178, 202, 212, 213, 230, 243, and 246, and in the schedule of repealed parts of statutes, as relate to the subject of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy and matters consequential thereon, and also to clause (A) added by their lordships to the Bill, and which have been disagreed to by the Commons, for the following reasons:—Because they consider the appointment of a chief judge as the head of the Court of Bankruptcy in London to be unnecessary; the original jurisdiction which it is proposed to confer does not, in their opinion, require a judge of high attainments and authority, but would be equally well exercised by the London Commissioners, and the creation of a new judge to be the judge of appeals seems not to be called for by any necessity, because the appeals in bankruptcy at present occupy the time of the lords justices acting as the Court of Appeal for only a few days in each year, and there is no reason to expect that the passing of the Bill will occasion such an increase in the appeal business as to prevent its being satisfactorily disposed of by the same appellate tribunal; because the proposal to confer original jurisdiction on the chief judge is not at all calculated to secure consistency in the administration of the bankrupt law, inasmuch as this jurisdiction would be confined to the metropolitan district, and no provision would be made by it for securing uniformity of decision among the commissioners of the district courts and the county court judges sitting in bankruptcy, and if this consistency in the administration of the bankrupt law is to be obtained by means of a central and controlling authority, it is unnecessary to create a new judge of appeals for the purpose, as the object is already secured by the existing Court of Appeal; because if it is a principal object of the Bill gradually to supersede the commissioners by means of the establishment of the Chief Judge, so great a change in the present system ought not to take place in this manner, but should be made only by the express authority of Parliament. With the preceding exceptions, the Lords do not insist upon any of their amendments to the said Bill to which the Commons disagree, and agree to the amendments made by the Commons to their lordships' amendments and also to the original Bill."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved that the House do not insist in their disagreement to the amendments made by the Lords. They were well aware, and the reasons just read made it very apparent, that the amendments to this Bill as it originally passed the House, and on which the other House of Parliament insisted, were those which related to the appointment, duties, and salary of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. If the House were to persist in the view they had taken when the Bill was last before them, the consequence would naturally be that the Bill would be lost; and, under those circumstances, it had become the duty of the Government to consider what course they should advise the House to pursue; and, although her Majesty's Government retained the opinion expressed by its members in the discussions on the various stages of the Bill in favour of the appointment of the Chief Judge, for the reasons adopted by that House and transmitted to the other House of Parliament, and although they still considered that the provisions of the Bill were greatly impaired, and its chances of working well at the outset were very much diminished indeed by the omission of that portion relating to the Chief Judge, they considered that even without that part of the Bill there was an amount of good in it which was capable of working, although defectively, which ought to induce the Government to take the Bill mutilated and shorn, as he admitted it to be, rather than not have the measure at all. Under these circumstances the Government had come to the conclusion to advise the House—of course it was for the House to consider whether they should adopt that advice—not to insist further in their disagreement to the amendments made by the Lords, but practically to accept the Bill as amended by the other House. He should, however, have to propose certain verbal amendments, to which he was sure no objection would be made, which were rendered necessary for the purpose of enabling those by whom the general orders were to be made to make them in proper time, in the absence of the Lords Justices. He now begged to move that the House do not insist in their disagreement with the amendments made by the Lords.

The motion was then agreed to.

COMMON LAW.

COSTS IN FRIVOLOUS ACTIONS—3 & 4 VICT. C. 24, s. 2; 23 & 24 VICT. C. 126, s. 34.

Saunders v. Kirwan, C. P., 9 W. R. 706.

The point raised in this case was as to the proper manner of framing a certificate under the Common Law Procedure Act of last year (s. 34), which shall have the effect of giving the plaintiff the costs of an action for a wrong from the defendant, although the sum recovered by the verdict therein is under £5. This provision was passed for the further discouragement of frivolous actions. The previous Act on the subject (3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2), which does not appear to have been repealed by the provision just mentioned, applies only to cases where the amount recovered by the verdict is under forty shillings, and for that and other reasons was considered to be insufficient for the desired object. In the former Act the burden of obtaining a certificate is thrown by the Legislature on the plaintiff—i. e. if notwithstanding the smallness of the amount recovered by the verdict he seeks for costs, he must procure from the judge a certificate to the effect that the action was brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover the damages sought, or was brought in respect of a wilful and malicious trespass or grievance. Such a certificate is, of course, framed affirmatively; but in the statute just passed the certificate is in the negative—that is, it is required to state three several things, 1, that the action was not brought to try a right; 2, that the trespass or grievance was not wilful and malicious; and 3, that the action was not fit to be brought. And this form is rendered necessary by another change made in the later Act, namely, to throw the onus of obtaining a certificate (where one is sought under its provisions) on the defendant instead of the plaintiff—for as the law now stands a plaintiff who recovers above 40s. and under £5 will be entitled to his costs, if the defendant fails to apply for and obtain a certificate (always supposing the question as to whether the action ought to have been brought in the county court not to arise under the circumstances of the case) to the effect above-mentioned. The present case, however, shows that provided one of the three things negatived in the certificate, be the malice of the defendant, the very words of the Act need not be so closely followed as to render it essential also to negative the existence of wilfulness. That is to say, if the judge will certify that the trespass or grievance sued for was not malicious, it will be sufficient to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, although it does not further proceed to state that neither was it wilful.

CRIMINAL LAW.

Reg. v. Sleep, C. C. R., 9 W. R. 709.

This is an instructive case for those who are concerned with cases stated for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. This is a tribunal for the solution of doubtful questions of criminal law, which was provided for the first time by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78; an Act which enables any court of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, or any court of quarter sessions, (whether for the county or for a borough) upon the conviction of any person before them, to reserve any question of law which shall have arisen at the trial for the consideration of the justices of either bench and the barons of the exchequer; and to respite the execution of or postpone the judgment on such conviction until such question shall have been considered and decided. The Act further proceeds to direct that in such emergencies a case shall be stated and signed by the Court before which the trial was held, setting forth the question or questions of law reserved, with the special circumstances upon which the same shall have arisen. No more definite instructions for the preparation of the case than these are given in the Act itself; but this deficiency has been, to a certain extent, supplied by Rules of Court bearing date June 1, 1850,—by which it is, among other things, ordered that every case transmitted for the consideration of the Court "shall briefly state the question or questions of law reserved, and such facts only as raise the question or questions submitted."

Even, however, as so supplemented, the directions as to the framing of the case are sufficiently vague to leave a good deal to the discretion and ability of the respective judges by whom they are drawn up; and accordingly, considerable difference may be observed in them. Some bear the impress of the skilful and practised pens of our most eminent judges, while others disclose the uncertainty and want of arrangement which not unfrequently characterise the literary efforts of a bench of magistrates, even when under the superintendence of their chairman.

In the present instance the case was undoubtedly ill-drawn, but the fault appears to have arisen from the over-caution rather than the unskilfulness of the recorder by whom it was submitted—who has, indeed, the well-deserved reputation of being an able lawyer. But he appears, nevertheless, to have much excited the irritability of certain members of the court, and particularly to have drawn down upon himself the censure of the Chief Baron.

The prisoner was indicted for having been found in possession of naval stores, and evidence was given of his having consigned to a carrier for conveyance elsewhere a cask of metal, some of which was marked with the broad arrow; and no evidence on his side was tendered to account for such being in his possession; but, on the other hand, no direct evidence was given on the part of the Crown to show that the prisoner was aware that any portion of the metal in the cask bore the mark of the broad arrow. After setting forth the above facts the case proceeded to state that these questions were severally put by the Court to the jury—1. Whether the prisoner was found in possession of copper marked with the broad arrow, to which they replied "Yes." 2. Whether the prisoner knew that the copper or any part of it was marked, to which they replied, "We have not sufficient evidence before us to show that he knew it;" and 3, Whether the prisoner had reasonable means of knowing that it was so marked, to which they answered "He had." Upon this finding (proceeded the case) a verdict of guilty was recorded.

To the case so stated, the court of appeal raised several objections. In the first place they observed that according to the evidence the copper was not in the possession of the prisoner at all, but of the carrier; but that question was not reserved, and the question put by the recorder to the jury was, indeed, inconsistent with the fact. In the next place they remarked that as the case was framed it appeared that the jury had expressly negatived the fact that the prisoner knew of the metal being marked; and (notwithstanding certain cases which were pressed upon them) the Court held that where the mens rea was expressly disproved, no criminal offence could be committed. On the other hand, the Court held that on the above evidence there was ample ground for the jury to have come to the conclusion that the prisoner was aware of the metal while in his possession having been marked; and that the proper course for the recorder to have adopted would have been to have told the jury that if they found so and so was the case they ought to find the man guilty; and in case they should have so found should then have asked the court of appeal whether in point of law his direction was right. But instead of this the jury were instructed to find a species of special verdict and not a verdict of "guilty;" upon which alone the court of error could act by way of affirmance. "Every case," added the Court, "ought to contain a distinct statement that by the verdict of the jury the man has been found guilty, and should then reserve for us the point of law which may have arisen."

MORTGAGES.—DAYS FOR PAYMENT OF INTEREST.

Perhaps some of your numerous correspondents will favour me with their opinions upon the following suggestion.

It has frequently occurred to me that it would be a great practical convenience if, instead of the present practice of inserting for the day of redemption in mortgage deeds a day six months from the date of the deed, the 1st of January or 1st of July were always inserted, with a covenant for future payment of interest on those days in case of default.

Is there any practical or theoretical objection to this departure from long and universal custom?

Where parties have several sums lent on mortgage it is inconvenient that their incomes should be received at several different and not particularly accustomed periods; or where trustees have various sums to collect and pay over; or a solicitor has a number of clients for whom he receives the interest on various mortgages, the collection would be much facilitated if all, like rent, dividends, &c., were paid on some day usually adopted, and therefore easily remembered, on both sides.

The only inconvenience on the other hand which occurs to me would be that, of course, the first payment of interest would have to be rather more or less than the usual half-yearly interest, according as the period of redemption was made to fall. But this would be a trifling matter of arrangement, and not a recurring inconvenience.

RECENT DECISIONS.

In the last number of the Solicitors' Journal, page 669, under the head of "Recent Decisions," some remarks are made on the case of Heslop v. Metcalfe, reported in 3 My. & Cr. 183, in confirmation of the ground of that decision, which was that the solicitor had discharged the client. I have not the report of that case by me at the time of writing this, but I have a most clear recollection that the solicitor in that case actually arrested his client for the amount of his bill of costs, and that that fact was adduced in evidence on the motion before Lord Cottenham. My contention was that the arrest was tantamount to a discharge, and so the Court held.

[This letter amounts to this—that the effect of Heslop v. Metcalfe is correctly stated in the passage referred to by Mr. Green.—Ed. S. J.]

The Provinces.

TAMWORTH.—At a meeting of the Council of Tamworth, on the 1st instant, Mr. Thomas Argyle, solicitor, of that borough, was unanimously elected to the office of town clerk, rendered vacant by the resignation of Francis Willington, Esq., who had held the appointment for upwards of a quarter of a century. The thanks of the council were cordially voted to Mr. Willington, for his long and able performance of the duties of the office.

Review.

A Letter to the Right Hon. the Viscount Palmerston, on his Bills for the Disintegration of the Statute Law. By GEORGE COODE. Second Edition. London: Ridgway; Sweet.

This pamphlet has made its appearance most opportunely. The Bills, to which it refers, have passed the third reading in the Upper House, and have received a certain degree of commendation from the Times. The article, however, in which the rapid action of the Commons has been praised by our contemporary, expresses thankfulness rather for the title than for the substance of these Bills. The Times has remarked that consolidations must be taken upon trust, and that Tribonian, probably, was never interrogated as to the details of his compilation under Justinian. The author of this pamphlet, however, alleges that these Bills are not entitled to be regarded as consolidations of the criminal law except in name. In order to prove the soundness of his criticism, he first states fairly the conditions to which every process of consolidation should conform. We consider his observations on this head to be entitled to unqualified praise; but we think that the Bills which he so severely censures conform in very many respects, though not entirely, to the canons upon which he bases his criticism.

The writer lays down, as the first rule to which every consolidation of the statute law should conform, that those portions of it which are at present dispersed throughout the statute book, "should be collected together and arranged in such a way that the parts that have most connection in meaning and effect should be most closely brought together; so that they shall throw mutual light each one on the other;" and that every subject should be thus wholly comprised in a single enactment. This is a description of consolidation from which, we think, few will dissent. He again, in a logical way, defines consolidation to be "a placing together of all those parts of any subject which make up the whole of that particular subject." The author then contrasts with this description and definition of consolidation the principles which the Bills now before Parliament profess to realize. He considers that these Bills are the very reverse of what a true consolidation should be; instead of associating the disjecta membra, the Bills, as he alleges, still further dis sever them, and so are entitled by him "Bills for the disintegration of the Statute Law." The principle of them, according to his view, is, "that of picking out the similar or identical parts from all different subjects, and stringing all those similar parts together in one Bill." We do not think that the Bills now before the Upper House, after having passed their ordeal in the Commons, are open to this sweeping objection. These Bills are six in number, and relate, respectively, to offences against the person, malicious injuries to property, larceny, forgery, coining, and to accessories and abettors. There is no confusion in the boundaries of these subjects, but each in its integrity is disposed of by a single Bill. The penalty, indeed, for assaulting a clergyman while exercising his functions, to use the example put by Mr. Coode, and that imposed on any other offence, viz. libel, may be enacted in the very same terms; and the first, we admit, has its proper place in ecclesiastical law, while the other should be connected with those legislative provisions which regulate the necessary license of discussion. To classify together these and other dissimilar cases, would doubtless be to effect a nominal consolidation only. A child, as the author puts it, could sort the hands of hundreds of watches, but this process would afford no insight into their mechanism. Neither, we may add, could it even assist the memory, the only utility which any such proceeding could be alleged to subserve. "Ordo jureat memoriam," says Lord Bacon; and, certainly, the practitioner is more likely to remember the details of a particular penalty, and the procedure necessary to enforce it, when he remembers it in connection with the other branches of the subject to which it relates, than as an abstract number in a statute containing perhaps a thousand similar insipidly monotonous provisions. The author observes, "that there is no consolidation possible by the aggregation of similar parts." This proposition follows necessarily from the preceding maxims stated by him. He adds, however, an observation which pushes his theory too far, or, rather, which is not warranted by it. He considers that no consolidation of the criminal law is possible. This is a statement which we would never have expected to find in this pamphlet, the principles of which are sufficiently sound, sensible, and philosophic. But we agree with him to this extent, that an isolated collection of all penal provisions, unconnected with definitions of the offences to which they are attached, would be an unnecessary and unwarranted attempt at consolidation. Rights, wrongs, and remedies, in their criminal aspect, however, admit of as ready a consolidation as any other branch of law. It is true that remedies are partly preventive and partly remedial. But there is an essential distinction between both classes;—since the former relate exclusively to disputed rights to property. The executive and police are, indeed, preventive remedies as regards personal injuries. But, if we are to make a classification of heads of law upon such abstract, or rather transcendental principles, all laws ipso facto are preventive. We regret, therefore, that Mr. Coode committed himself to the statement that a consolidation of the criminal law is impossible. We think, on the contrary, that it is quite possible, and that he has himself enunciated with great clearness the principles upon which such a consolidation may be easily effected.

The writer observes that the Consolidation Bills now before Parliament are not simply useless, but that they are likewise obstructive, as regards the consolidation of the remaining fragments of the statutes dismembered by them. This remark is of the utmost importance. If the principle upon which these Bills proceed be unsound, and we certainly should wish to see them more logical than they are, they must, if passed into law, be wholly ignored in any subsequent scheme of consolidation that will adopt a different system; or else legislators will encounter difficulties similar to those experienced by bad reasoners, who arrange the subjects of their thesis in illogical cross divisions. The Bills criticised by Mr. Coode, notwithstanding their ambitious comprehensiveness, wholly omit the provisions of the law regulating penalties in their imposition and enforcement. This omission of the part of Hamlet shows clearly the inaccuracy of result which is sure to attend all attempts to classify voluminous details without a close regard to their mutual logical relations. Some other of the eighty-three Consolidation Bills promised by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, who was one of the commission who prepared these Bills, may provide for this. A sound and logical, as distinct from a nominal, consolidation of every branch of law, is, without any doubt, possible enough; and criminal law is certainly a branch of jurisprudence sufficiently definite and succinct to admit of consolidation. Though differing thus from Mr. Coode we recommend his pamphlet to the attention of all who feel an interest in the subject of the reformation of our law. He states his data with great distinctness and with considerable felicity of illustration; and though we consider that he pushes his views to an extreme point as regards the question of the consolidation of the criminal law generally, yet we think that his essay discloses facts and arguments that go far to show that the Bills which he criticises are likely to disappoint the expectations of their authors. They do not, however, mix together heterogeneous subjects. Their purview is confined each to a single class of offences; but they are certainly deficient as regards definitions and completeness.

Estates Gazette.

RECENT SALES.—SALE OF THE WROXHALL ABBEY ESTATE, WARWICKSHIRE.—This important property, comprising the very interesting old abbey, with the mansion and nearly 2,000 acres of land, was submitted to public competition on Thursday last by Messrs. Chinnock and Galsworthy, and, as is usual with estates of this magnitude, the sale excited considerable interest, and attracted a large attendance of gentlemen from the midland counties and elsewhere. The first offer made was £80,000; the biddings soon reached £90,000, and finally £93,000, at which price the hammer fell, and the property was declared sold. The fortunate possessor of the estate is now James Dugdale, Esq., of Hart-hill, Manchester, and it is gratifying to find the new owner is of an old Warwickshire family, whose name has long been associated with the abbey of Wroxhall through the celebrated work on Warwickshire, &c., known as "Dugdale's Monasticon," which gives a minute historical description of this venerable abbey; from which it appears that the priory of Wroxhall was founded by Hugh de Hutton, in the reign of Stephen, about 1143. Henry VIII., in 1544, granted the abbey and lands to Robert Burgoyne, in whose family it remained until 1713, when it passed to Sir Christopher Wren, whose imperishable fame will ever give an interest to the place, and whose descendants have been in possession up to the present time.

Valuable and important Estate, containing about 325 acres, at Hednesford and Leacroft, in the parish of Cannock, Staffordshire; including the celebrated Hotel, the "Cross Keys" at Hednesford, Houses, and other buildings, in the village; and Lands immediately in connection with and adjoining to the Hednesford New Colliery, the Cannock Mineral Railway, and the Canal Wharf and Tramway now in course of formation by the Birmingham Canal Company.

TO BE SOLD BY AUCTION, by E. & C. ROBINS, on WEDNESDAY, the 21st day of AUGUST next, at the SWAN HOTEL, WOLVERHAMPTON, at Four o'clock in the afternoon—the Valuable Estate, called "The Cross Keys," at Hednesford, the principal part whereof is Freehold, and a small portion Copyhold; containing about 225 Acres, including the hotel, training stables, farm and other buildings, occupied by Mr. John Wilkins and others; also various houses, training stables, other buildings and lands in and about the village, and extending from the Cross Keys Hotel and Mr. Pigott's Hednesford New Colliery, to the line of the Cannock Mineral Railway.

The high road from Cannock to Rugeley passes through the estate.

The recently constructed railways and canals have already advanced the neighbourhood, and occasioned an extensive application of land for villa and general building purposes. Public works in contemplation will confer still further benefits.

The large quantity of coal raised on Cannock Chase, and particularly at Mr. Pigott's Hednesford New Colliery, adjoining this property, clearly indicates the existence of mines in the estate, and experienced practical miners have reported them of unquestionable quality and great value.

The enclosure of the wastes now in progress will, as in the case of other parishes that have already been enclosed most materially alter and improve the character and value of the district.

The Estate will be first offered in one lot, but if not sold, will be immediately put up in about nine lots.

Particulars, with plans and conditions of sale, will speedily be prepared, and may be procured from Messrs. BARKER, BOWKER, & PEAKE, Solicitors, 1, Gray's-inn-square, London; Mr. PEAKE, Land Agent, Chartley Manor House, near Stafford; Mr. BAILEY, Mineral Agent, The Pleck, near Walsall; at the Cross Keys at Hednesford; the Swan Hotel, Wolver-hampton; and from E. & C. ROBINS, Surveyors and Auctioneers, New-street, Birmingham.

TO BE SOLD, pursuant to a Decree of the High

Court of Chancery, made in the causes of EMERSON v. MASON, and EMERSON v. PEARCE, with the approbation of the Vice Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, the Judge to whose Court these causes are attached, in Eight Lots, by Messrs. DRIVER, the persons appointed by the said Judge, at the AUCTION MART, London, on WEDNESDAY, the 21st day of AUGUST, 1861, at ONE o'clock precisely, the following FREEHOLD and COPYHOLD ESTATES, situate at St. Albans, in the county of Herts; Peldon and Barking Side, both in the county of Essex; Arlington and Hellingly, and Hailsham, both in the county of Sussex;
the whole containing about 526 acres, and producing a rental of about £470 per annum.

Lot 1. A Freehold Estate called Tittenhanger Farm (with a small part copyhold); containing about 203 acres of arable and pasture land, in the parishes of St. Peter and St. Stephen, in the liberty of St. Albans, and close to the village of London Colney, with residence and homestead and a cottage. The lot is of the estimated rental value of £200 per annum, possession of which may be had on completion of the purchase.

Lot 2. A Copyhold Estate, called Pete Tye Farm, containing about 109 acres of arable and pasture land, in the parish of Peldon, near Colchester, with farm house and suitable buildings, in the occupation of Mr. Benjamin Clark, at the rent of £100 per annum.

Lot 3. A Freehold Estate, called Perryman's Farm, containing about 28 acres of accommodation land, with house and out-buildings, situate near Bunting's-bridge, in the parish of Barking, Essex, and in the occupation of Mrs. Young, at the rent of £60 per annum.

Lot 4. A Freehold Estate, called Bowlers and Hagley Farm (with small part copyhold), containing about 137 acres of arable and pasture land, in the parishes of Arlington and Hellingly, Sussex, with farm house and suitable buildings, together with five small tenements, let to and in the occupation of Mr. Robert Wright, at the rent of £70 per annum.

Lot 5. A Parcel of Freehold Grazing Marsh Land, containing 14 acres, in the parish and near the town of Hailsham, in the occupation of Mr.
Robert Wright, at the rent of £29 per annum.

Lot 6. A Parcel of like Marsh Land, containing about 12½ acres, situate in the parish and near the town of Hailsham, in the occupation of Mrs.
Walker, at the rent of £23 per annum.

Lot 7. A Parcel of like Marsh Land, containing about 13 acres, and adjoining the last lot, in the occupation of Mr. Akers, at £35 17s. 6d. per annum.

Lot 8. A parcel of similar Marsh Land, containing about 8½ acres, adjoining the last lot, and in the occupation of Mr. W. Hilde, at £18 10s. per annum.

Printed particulars, with plans annexed, may be had on application of Mr. W. H. WITHALL, Solicitor, 7, Parliament-street, London, S.W.; of commons, London; of Mr. T. SMITH, Solicitor, No. 15, Furnival's-inn, London; of Messrs. TAYLOR & HOARE, Solicitors, No. 23, Great James-street, Bedford-row, London; Mr. H. DAIN, Solicitor, 12, Parliament-street, London, S.W.; of Mr. H. MASON, at Robinson's Estate Office, Richmond, Surrey; and No. 17, Lincoln's-inn-fields, London; at the principal inns in the neighbourhood of the properties; at the Mart, near the Bank of England; and of Messrs. DRIVER, Surveyors, Land Agents, and Auctioneers, 5, Whitehall, London, S.W.

NORTH WALES, nearly opposite BARMOUTH.

TO BE SOLD BY AUCTION, by Messrs. CHURTON, at the GORS-Y-GE-DOL ARMS HOTEL, in the County of Merioneth, on SATURDAY, the 24th day of AUGUST, 1861, at TWO o'clock in the afternoon, the above desirable FREEHOLD ESTATE, containing 340a. 3r. 26p. of land, or thereabouts. In One Lot (including the several farms mentioned underneath), but if not so sold the estate will be offered in the following or such other lots as may be agreed on at the time of sale, and subject to conditions to be then produced.

Lot 1. The Arthog Hill Mansion, with the gardens, lodges, stables, coach-house, farm buildings, private chapel, quay woods, arable and pasture land, sheep walks, labourers' cottages, and appurtenances, and four farms, respectively called Buarth-will, Tyn-y-graig, Plas-y-Bugall, and Bwlch-yr-pendre, with a water corn mill, containing together 250a. 0r. 21p. or thereabouts.

Lot 2. Two Farms called Creigennan and Llanwydd, with several closes of land and sheep walks, called Frydd-y-gyd and Frydd-y-chiw-las, held therewith, containing together 64a. 2r. 10p. or thereabouts.

Lot 3. Two small farms, called Pantre-y-erw and Trawsdir, with the respective lands thereto, containing together 23a. 1r. 8p. or thereabouts.

Lot 4. An excellent and roomy messuage or dwelling-house, pleasantly situate, with coach house, stable, shippon, and walled garden, containing 3r. 4p.

The Mansion, built in the castellated style of architecture, stands on the side of a hill overlooking the estuary of the river Mawddach, two miles from Barmouth, and six from Dolgelly; commands a charming view of the finest scenery in the principality, and is approached by two beautiful drives from the Dolgelly and Towyn turnpike road, which intersects the estate. It has a good entrance hall, with entertaining rooms, suitable domestic offices, and eleven bed rooms. The gardens and grounds are tastefully arranged and planted, the land occupied with the mansion drained, and the cottages well tenanted. The woods are of fine ornamental larch and oak timber; and a trout stream bounds the property, forming a ravine and waterfalls, noted for their romantic beauty. The farms are well tenanted. A railway connected with the main lines will shortly be completed to Machynlleth, twenty miles distant. The Mid-Wales Railway is projected to come near the estate, and the Aberystwith and Welsh Coast line to pass through part of the land, with a station near thereto.

Lithographic plans, with particulars, may be had at the principal hotels in North Wales, fourteen days before the sale, and with further information, from Mr. FOWDEN, Solicitor, Altrincham, Cheshire; Mr. JOHN WORTHINGTON, Solicitor, Cheshire, near Manchester; Messrs. BOWER, SON, & COTTON, 46, Chancery-lane, London; or from Messrs. CHURTON, Auctioneers, Chester and Whitechurch.

CURRENT TOPICS.

At the approaching meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, which will be held at Dublin on the 14th to the 21st, the following papers will be read in the department of jurisprudence:—

JAMES WHELAN.—Jurisprudence and the amendment of the law.

EDWARD WEBSTER.—Adaptation of the law to social change in the matter of liberty of opinion, in connection with the 13 Eliz. c. 12, and the 13 & 14 Charles 2, c. 4, commonly called the Act of Uniformity.

J. NAPIER HIGGINS.—The machinery of legislation.

Right Hon. JAMES WHITESIDE, M.P.—Criminal law amendment.

ARTHUR SYMONDS.—On the appropriate and adequate constitution of judicial tribunals, and the institution of the judiciary over them.

Baron HOLTZENDORF.—On public prosecutions in Prussia.

ISAAC J. MURPHY.—Suggestions for the improvement of the working of the grand jury system in Ireland, and its extension to England.

Right Honourable JAMES WHITESIDE, M.P.—The Landed Estates Court Act.

EDWARD WEBSTER.—On the establishment in the metropolis primarily, and afterwards in the provinces, of a land registration court for the voluntary registration of titles to freehold land in England and Wales, for the purposes of sale and mortgage.

DAVID M'CUBBIN.—Ought the management of bankrupts' estates to be placed in the hands of official assignees appointed by the Government, or assignees or trustees nominated by the creditors?

DAVID SMITH.—The necessity for a law to compel every trader to make an annual balance under pain of imprisonment.

J. C. SMITH.—The Scotch Marriage law.

DR. WADDILOVE.—The Law of Marriage and Divorce as at present existing in England, Ireland, and Scotland.

W. H. MORRIS.—The Marriage Law of the Empire.

LEGISLATION OF THE SESSION.

The Session of Parliament which came to a close last Tuesday, is in one respect, and that a very disagreeable one, the most instructive in the history of English legislation. It commenced at a time remarkable for the freedom of Parliament from all external pressure, and the absence of almost every topic of exciting interest. It was heralded as the Session par excellence of domestic improvement, and in particular of law amendment. Measures affecting the administration of our law in various departments, some of them of great importance, were stated to have been prepared with the utmost care and labour by the law advisers of the Crown; and sensible people throughout the country were rejoiced by the prospects of considerable legal reform during the general subsidence of political agitation. The mercantile classes were promised great things in the way of a new bankruptcy code and tribunal, and also a less extensive but somewhat important measure for the protection of manufacturers against the dishonest use of their trade-marks. The expectations of country gentlemen were excited by the pledge of Ministers to introduce again the Bill for the better management of Highways, and to save it from the fate which formerly attended it. Artists, literary men, and publishers, received an early promise of a measure for the protection of artistic copyright. They were told that before the Exhibition of 1862, they would be placed upon as good a footing as foreigners, and that it should no longer be said, with truth, that there was no adequate law in this country for the protection of copyright in works of fine art. The general public not less than lawyers were delighted by glowing pictures of a new Palace of Justice, all the arrangements for which it was said had been well considered, and were fully completed. The Criminal Law Consolidation Bills, which had figured in so many ministerial programmes, of course, were not forgotten; nor was the well-sounding phrase of Statute Law Revision left uninvoked. We say nothing of the grand scheme of registration for facilitating land transfer, about which so many notices have figured from time to time, for some sessions past, and which the late Attorney-General promised to explain to the House, at all events before last Easter. Neither do we now refer to many other less important Bills, which were either promised by the Government and never produced, or if produced have not been enacted; nor to such Bills as Mr. M'Mahon's County Courts Code, Mr. Hodgkinson's Fictitious Defences Bill, or, indeed, any of those to which we are, or were to have been, indebted to independent members of Parliament. Our object in thus contrasting the promises and performances of Ministers, is in order to call attention to the unfitness of the present machinery for legislation in this country. Whatever doubts might have existed upon this subject, must be by this time expelled from the minds of sceptics.

In the first place, notwithstanding reams of print in blue books about the drawing of Parliamentary Bills, insuring uniformity in their arrangement and form, and general revision of our statute book, the Bankruptcy Bill of the past session was admitted on all hands to be a rare specimen of awkward drawing—abounding in unskilful and loose phraseology, unscientific in its plan, and having little regard to the existing state of the statute book. It had, moreover, the radical defect of effecting extensive repeals of former Acts of Parliament in a fragmentary manner, and by way of reference or implication. For instance, it repeals expressly a number of clauses in the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), and also "such other parts of the said Act as may be inconsistent with the present Act." This Bill was brought forward by the Attorney-General in the House of Commons, and a few days afterwards the Lord Chancellor, in the House of Lords, when introducing the Statute Law Revision Bill, attributed the wretched confusion which now disgraces our statute book to the "vicious mode" of repealing statutes, "not expressly, but by simply enacting that all statutes inconsistent with the particular Act should be repealed." "The difficulty," said his lordship, "was to decide what statutes were inconsistent with it." Accordingly, as might have been expected, a very unseemly discussion took place in the House of Lords, when the Bill was last under consideration there, between Lord Westbury its avowed author and Lord Cranworth, who flatly contradicted one another as to the effect which the Act would have on the jurisdiction in bankruptcy of the Lords Justices, a point intimately involved in the question of implied repeal. Are we not justified, then, in saying that even Government Bills are prepared without any regard to uniformity or scientific arrangement? We have already said so much in this Journal, on this subject, that we need not further advert to it here. More than twenty years ago, Mr. Arthur Symonds, and more recently, Mr. Coode, so clearly pointed out the defects in our system of Parliamentary drawing, and gave such practical suggestions for its reform, that the law advisers of the Crown are absolutely without excuse for their persistence in the present haphazard and unmethodical procedure.

But the defects of our machinery of legislation are by no means confined to the manner of preparing Bills. Every session the passing of any Law Bill, however useful its provisions may be, and however little opposition it may have to encounter, is becoming more and more uncertain. The recent Trade Marks Bill is a monstrous instance in point. Parliament had assembled only a day or two when the President of the Board of Trade promised that the Bill would shortly be presented to Parliament; and so it was. It passed the House of Lords early in March, and by the 15th of April had reached a second reading in the House of Commons. The 22nd was fixed for going into committee upon it. This, however, was never accomplished, although the Bill was in the paper for this purpose not less than 18 times during the months of April, May, June, and July. The Bill was originally prepared at the entreaty of numerous chambers of commerce, and other important bodies; and this is the second session in which there has been a failure in passing it, owing to the obstructiveness of the House of Commons, or rather to the inefficiency of its machinery for dealing with such measures. The Government Highways Bill also belongs to this class. Having at the commencement of the last two sessions bid fair for success, it found itself at the conclusion of each in the limbo of the waste-paper office. Is it not possible to induce the House of Commons to devote a reasonable share of its time to the business of legislation, and to give up for this purpose its nauseous privilege of unlimited speech-making? One hour any night might have disposed of the Trade Marks Bill; and yet this could not be obtained in a session remarkable beyond most others for the small amount of work actually accomplished, although on more than one of the nights on which the Bill was down for committee, some spouter counted out the House.

The Bills providing for the erection of new courts and offices present the existing system of bungling in yet another and somewhat novel light. These Bills emanated from the Government itself, and resulted from elaborate and careful enquiries instituted by a Royal Commission appointed for the purpose. They were announced as being of scarcely less importance than the Bankruptcy Bill itself, and the "Site Bill" was pressed through the House of Commons with as much force as Mr. Cowper could bring to the task. At the last moment, however—so late as the 16th of July, after the select committee of the House of Commons had closed its sittings, and made its report—the Lords of the Treasury issued a "minute," the professed object of which was to apprise Parliament and the public of the extent of liability to which the public revenues might be subject, if the Government scheme should be carried into effect. The result of the Treasury calculations goes to show that in the opinion of the Treasury the new palace of justice will cost half a million more than the sum estimated by the Royal Commissioners, on whose report the Government itself framed its Bills. We may say in passing that the figures contained in the Treasury minute are purely conjectural, and that this document has been ably dealt with in some remarks of the Incorporated Law Society, which we hope to publish next week. We now advert to the subject only as another illustration of the manner in which important measures deeply affecting the administration of justice in this country are launched by the Government.

It may be said, however, that the past session has at all events produced a Criminal Code, or a set of Consolidation Acts which, taken together, may almost be entitled to the dignity of that appellation. No doubt, several important Bills for the consolidation of the criminal law have been passed; but, in truth, the history of these productions furnishes no room for boasting as to the manner in which such work is accomplished in this country. It is now many years since to Mr. Lonsdale was committed the task of preparing a series of Bills which, if taken together, might be accepted as a consolidation of the criminal law of England. Unhappily, however, the work was commenced and carried on, and has been completed with the least possible regard to well-considered principles, or to method. The Bills which originally came from the hands of Mr. Lonsdale and his colleagues, were submitted to the revision of the late Chief Justice Jervis, Mr. Greaves, and others, and in 1856 were introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Cranworth. Every succeeding set of law officers of the Crown have seized upon these same Bills as an important item of political capital, and Mr. Bellenden Ker and his nominees preyed upon them for years. We need not be afraid of stating that they have been made the excuse for a very large and useless waste of public money, and did great injury to the cause of statute law reformation by keeping alive that organised hypocrisy—the late Statute Law Commission. Such have been the indirect disadvantages resulting from these criminal law Bills. Any account of the defects inherent in the Bills themselves, in the manner of their preparation, and the want of method characterising them from their inception to the time of their becoming law, would be necessarily too large an undertaking for us at present. We may mention, however, that at the close of the session of 1857, these same Bills after having passed through the hands of Sir John Jervis and Mr. Greaves, and subsequently of the Statute Law Commission, were hurried through the House of Lords with a speed that caused universal surprise, as soon as it was discovered in the House of Commons that the Bills were far from being a mere consolidation of existing law—as was represented in the Upper House—and were moreover disfigured by not a few startling blunders. For instance, although the Bills appointed punishments for offences, they failed to repeal existing enactments against them. A similar fate befel these Bills in the two succeeding sessions, being brought in at the close of each only for the sake of appearances, and not with the view to actual legislation. It was felt that they could not be proposed to Parliament as measures of pure and simple consolidation, and that so far as they pretended to be amendments of the law, their accuracy or their authority could not be relied upon. But early in the session of 1860, after a considerably increased expenditure of money upon these belaboured productions, and much retouching, they were again brought forward with the further pretensions of an assimilation of the criminal law of Ireland to that of England, and also of some substantial improvements in both. The former blunder was moreover attempted to be remedied by a repealing Act which at the time we showed to have been by no means free from mistakes. We also pointed out some puzzling and unmeaning alterations in the existing law, which caused great doubt in the minds of lawyers, and also in the mind of Parliament, about accepting the Bills without going through the whole of them clause by clause, which was obviously impossible. After much and very reasonable reluctance, however, and finally amid great haste and pressure, they have been admitted upon the statute book—an event, let us hope, which may prove to be for the best. But so far from these Bills being the subject of gratulation, we must insist that they afford the strongest possible proof of the necessity, if not of a department of justice, at least of some suitable agency for the accomplishment of such work.

The foregoing observations relate only to such Bills as specially affect the administration of justice and are introduced to Parliament by responsible advisers of the Crown. It is, of course, very desirable that every statute should conform to well-considered rules, as to the arrangement of its subject matter, its mode of expression, and its relation to existing law. But it were obviously premature to expect this so long as important Government Bills, which are intended to create new jurisdictions, and to lay down explicit rules for their direction, or to make serious alterations in the principles of our system of jurisprudence, are, both in their conception and progress, characterised by such defects and misfortunes as we have mentioned. The first step towards improvement, therefore, must be in the case of Government Bills; and the time has certainly come when it ought to be no longer possible for the Attorney-General to present a Bill to the House of Commons, framed in a manner which comes within the severest reprobation of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords—as in the case of the recent Bankruptcy Bill. If ever there is to be anything like science in the composition of our statute-book ought it not to commence now that we are attempting its revision and reformation? Of what use is consolidation if we proceed to accumulate fresh heaps of lumber which will speedily call for assortment or removal? But while the same law officers who deplore the “vicious system” of repeal by implication, and make it the apology for asking Parliament to accept upon trust an Act to repeal expressly a multitude of enactments already impliedly repealed, introduce an important Bill tainted with the self-same vice, what hope is there of any consistent effort at improvement in the manner of legislation?

Various measures have been proposed for the remedy of some of the evils to which we have referred. Amongst others it has been suggested that an officer and staff should be appointed by both Houses of Parliament for the revision of all public Bills; and that it should be the duty of such official to “advise on the legal effect of every Bill; and, in particular, on the existing state of the law affected by a proposed Bill, its language and structure,” &c. Mr. Coode, in his evidence before the select committee of 1857, was of opinion that a “mere revising clerk” would be sufficient for this purpose. Suggestions have also been thrown out for the formation of a Parliamentary board, whose special duty it would be to attend to the process of law making. There has been no lack of propositions which are to be found at length in numerous blue books, to which we must be content to refer our readers for further information. All that we now have to say is that it is unfortunately too clear that the utmost need exists for the adoption of some plan which will save our statute book from utter confusion, and facilitate the passing of such law Bills as are admitted on all hands to be useful, and which are now prevented from becoming law by the unsuitableness of the machinery of Parliament for the existing exigencies of legislation.

COMMON LAW.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS, SECT. 17—WHAT CONSTITUTES ACCEPTANCE AND RECEIPT OF GOODS.

Cusack v. Robinson, Q. B., 9 W. R. 735.

This is a case of some interest to the commercial world, affording as it does, a fresh and practical reading on one of the clauses of that much vexed Act, the Statute of Frauds. One of its provisions (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 17) requires that on a sale of goods for the price of £10 and upwards, there must be, in order to bind the buyer, an acceptance by him of part of the goods, and an actual receiving of the same; and all those cases in which there is no earnest given, nor any part payment made, nor any such note or memorandum in writing of the bargain as the statute specifies. Now, a good deal of the litigation arising on this Act has turned upon the question of what constitutes such an acceptance of the goods sold as will satisfy the statute, as to which it is to be observed primarily, that it is clear that every acceptance supposes a previous delivery in law, though (as shown by the present case) not necessarily a previous receipt in fact by the purchaser. The dispute for the most part arises where the delivery has been to a third party, as to a carrier or wharfinger. Here the acceptance and receipt by the purchaser will depend, first, on whether such third party was or was not his agent for the purpose; and secondly on whether he had an opportunity before delivery of inspecting the goods. Thus in the present case, the defendant had verbally bought certain specific casks of butter, at Liverpool, and had written on a card, with his name and address thereon, that that number of casks were to be delivered at a certain wharf in London, which had been used by the defendant as a temporary warehouse for many years. But afterwards not approving of the butter delivered, he repudiated the bargain, and relied upon the defence that there was no receipt and acceptance by him under the circumstances, nor was there any memorandum note or memorandum of the contract in writing as required by the statute. The dispute was ultimately determined by the Court against him, on the ground, chiefly, that he had had an opportunity of inspecting, and did in fact select, the casks delivered, and that consequently he was not entitled for the first time to inspect them after they had been delivered, and then, if he pleased, to refuse acceptance. It was true that the wharfinger, though named by him as the party to whom the goods were to be delivered, might not have had his authority to accept the goode, but under the circumstances of the case the "acceptance" rendered requisite by the statute had in fact taken place when the casks were selected and bought by him at Liverpool. For there may well be, said the Court, an acceptance before receipt; neither is it necessary, under the statute, that the former should follow, or be contemporaneous with the latter. It may be remarked that this selection of the specific casks intended to be bought by the defendant distinguishes his position very materially from that of the defendant, in another case, somewhat similar to the present, which has been recently published in the Queen's Bench reports. The case referred to is that of Nicholson v. Bower (Ell. & Ell. p. 172), in which the defendant was held not to have "accepted" some wheat which, having bought by a written order to a country house, he had directed to be, and which was in fact, delivered at a certain warehouse in London for him, not having before had an opportunity of seeing the goods purchased, he was held entitled to inspect them previously to his accepting them; and until he had done so, or waived the right, no binding contract between himself and the owner arose.

LAW OF INSOLVENCY—INACCURACY IN SCHEDULE—WHEN NOT MENTIONED.

Romilio v. Halahan, Q. B., 9 W. R. 737.

The law requires that an insolvent who would be relieved from his liability in respect of any debt, must truly and properly describe it in his schedule. But the only object of this is, that his creditors should have due notice of his application; and therefore the true question in cases of a misdescription in the schedule, either of the insolvent himself or of the debt, always is, whether the schedule contains a description sufficient to have excited the attention of the creditor if he had read it, or whether it is intended or calculated to mislead him. Hence mistakes which could not have such effect, or which clearly did not originate in such intention, have been uniformly held immaterial; and in the case on which the present one was decided (Nias v. Nicholson, 2 C. & P. 120), where the insolvent was sued on a bill of exchange which he had accepted, and which was drawn by one M., and who had inserted in his schedule that he owed the plaintiff a bill to the same amount which he had drawn, and which had been accepted by M., Lord Tenterden left it to the jury to say whether the bill described in the schedule was meant to designate the one on which the action was brought, and if so, whether the misdescription was or was not intended to deceive; and as they answered the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative, the verdict was entered for the defendant. No attempt appears to have been afterwards made to disturb this verdict in the court in banc, and therefore this ruling, until the present case, has depended only on the opinion of a single judge; but it has now been expressly recognised and approved by the Court of Queen's Bench. The very same mistake appears, singularly enough, to have been made by the insolvent; and the Court held it to be immaterial, on the authority of Nias v. Nicholson, which the Chief Justice remarked, "has always been considered by the profession to be sound law."

LIABILITY OF AGENT—MONEY PAID BY MISTAKE.

Holland v. Russell, Q. B., 9 W. R. 737.

There are some nice questions on the law of agency with reference to the personal liability of an agent for money paid to him, by mistake, for the use of his principal. The general, and obviously just, rule as laid down in Car v. Prentice, (3 M. & S. 344), is that he can not be sued if he has before notice of the adverse claim, paid over the money to his principal, provided always that the payment were made to the agent that the money might be paid over by him, and that such payment was legal; for it may be that the agent is in the position of a stakeholder, or an auctioneer (see Burrough v. Skinner, 5 Burr. 2639), or he may have received the money wrongfully, as did the defendant in Snowden v. Davis, (1 Taunt. 359), where being a bailiff who had received money in excess of his authority, he was held not to have exonerated himself by a payment over to the sheriff. In the present case a sum of money had been paid to the defendant as agent for a foreign company, by way of contribution to a ship insurance, which, at the time of insurance, had been wrecked to the knowledge of the defendant, though not of the plaintiff. This concealment, however, was decided by a jury not to be fraudulent on the part of the defendant, though it vitiated the policy; and, therefore, as before, the sum paid in mistake had been re-demanded by the insurer, he had paid it over to his principal, he was held not to be personally liable for its amount, and an action brought against him to recover it failed.

It must be admitted with regard to this case that it does not clearly appear on what grounds the jury negatived the evidence of fraud. It may be presumed, however, that they came to that conclusion, thinking that the defendant bond-fide imagined his duty to his employers to be paramount to that of announcing the fact of the loss of the vessel to the owners, even though he knew that such loss at the time vitiated the policy; and not only this, but also thought it right on the same principle afterwards to receive the money paid to him in respect of such void policy. It certainly requires some further explanation of the circumstances of the case, before the conclusion of the jury appears a reasonable one; but no doubt such conclusion, however arrived at, put the plaintiff out of court.

ATTESTATION OF WILLS.

I think it would be well for your readers to pause before adopting the form of attestation to a will given in your number for the 20th July. The form now generally in use satisfies the registrars, without an affidavit of due execution. I doubt whether the suggested form would, and for this reason,

I formerly used the following form:—"Signed by the said C. F., the testator, as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us both, present at the same time, and who, before leaving his presence, or the presence of each other, have subscribed our names as witnesses thereto." But lately, on presenting a will so attested for probate, the district registrar required the usual affidavit of due execution, on the ground that the attestation clause did not contain the words of the statute. I contended that the clause comprised something more than the requirements of the Act; and that either it was untrue, or the will was duly executed; but the registrar adhering to his requirement, I had no alternative than to furnish the affidavit, and return to the old form of attestation.

Now there does not seem to be any substantial difference between the words "before leaving his presence," &c., and the "without quitting," &c., of the suggested form. R. G. F.

IRISH ANTE-UNION STATUTES.

Mr. Reilly's observations are correct enough; a statute is presumed to continue in force, unless the contrary be proved. But, if the opposite party had not appeared in the case at Warwick Sessions, it is doubtful whether the magistrates would have been satisfied with the production of the Irish statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, without further evidence of the present state of the Irish law of mixed marriages. M.

JUDGMENT DEBT—INTEREST.

I shall be glad if any of your numerous readers can inform me if a judgment on a bill of exchange or promissory note carries interest at £5 per cent.

By 76th Practice Rule of Hilary Term, 1853, every writ of execution may be endorsed to levy interest on the amount due at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, "provided that in cases where there is an agreement between the parties that more than four per cent. interest shall be secured by the judgment, the endorsement may be accordingly to levy the amount of interest so agreed."

Would a bill of exchange which carries interest at £5 per cent. be considered an agreement contemplated by the rule?

I understand that it is the practice to endorse writs of execution issued on a judgment on a bill of exchange or promissory note to levy interest at £5 per cent.; but is there any precedent for doing so? G. B. W.

Review.

A Practical Treatise of Powers. Eighth edition. By EDWARD SUGDEN (now Lord St. LEONARDS). London: H. Sweet, 3, Chancery-lane; Hodges, Smith & Co., Grafton-street, Dublin. 1861.

Prior to the publication of the first edition of Sugden on Powers, in 1808, that branch of law did not form the subject of any special treatise, if we except Mr. Powell's essay. The latter work, however, did not profess to treat discursively of the wide domain of real property law over which the subject of powers is spread. On the other hand, it somewhat resembles a colloquial narrative, containing, as Lord St. Leonards has observed, voluminous statements of facts, occupying many pages, "which serve only to confound the attention, when the precise point decided might have been expressed in as many lines." But we think that similar defects are to be found in the treatise before us. The author has described it as "a text-book, in which an attempt was made to deduce the rules from the decided cases." We consider, however, that it would have accomplished its object more effectually if it had been constructed with more regard to first principles and with less confidence in the practicability of reducing the rudis indigestaque moles of cases to a symmetrical harmony. On the other hand, as we shall presently show, there sometimes occur in Lord St. Leonards' treatise unnecessary dissertations upon the most recondite principles of feudal law. It appears to us to be very far from having exhausted the subject of Powers, notwithstanding Mr. Butler's commendation of it; note to Co Litt. viii., 3. We would bow with deference to Mr. Butler's opinion on the Berkeley Peerage Case, or on any of those fundamental crotchets which, at intervals of great periodic magnitude, become the subjects of actual litigation. But we cannot consider his authority conclusive as to the practical merits of a treatise, even though it should treat exclusively of real property law. When the first edition of Sugden on "Powers" appeared, there existed no legal periodical to review such a work, and Mr. Butler's opinion thus passed without correction. But this treatise appears to us to possess inferior practical merits to that of Mr. Chance, even though he made some blunders as regards first principles. His work, however, contains such a copious supply of important matter carefully winnowed of the less important elements of cases, (while it is widely different from a mere equity index,) that it will, we think, be still found more useful in daily practice than the work before us, although this is, as its noble and learned author intimates, enriched with all the legislative and judicial donations conferred upon the domain of powers since the publication of the seventh edition in 1845.

Lord St. Leonards states, cap. 1, p. 2, that powers were invalid at common law, and take their effect at law by force of the Statute of Uses. Mr. Preston, 3 Con. 265; and 3 Ab. 270; and Powell, on "Powers," pp. 1, 155, make the same statement, which, we think, is beyond all cavil. Mr. Chance, however, impugns this proposition, and, in support of his view, cites certain kinds of limitations resembling powers that have been always valid at law. He likewise alleges that the objects of a modern marriage settlement might be attained independently of the Statute of Uses. This class of limitations, however, is sui generis, and is devoid of the essential characteristic of powers, which is to divest an estate; although, by means of a technical circumlocution and a resort to the use of contingent remainders, their actual, though not their legal, result may be the same, as if powers had been limited for the same purposes. Thus, a remainder limited to a person whom the tenant for life, or any other should nominate (to cite the case put by Mr. Chance), is a good contingent remainder, and, in point of fact, though not in point of law, is tantamount to the limitation of a power to the tenant for life, or such other person, to appoint the estate over. An appointment is the discretionary limitation of a use. Suppose such a limitation to have been good if found in the primary instrument, it is equally good in the derivative one. If invalid in the former, then it is, in all cases, except as regards a question of perpetuity in respect to general powers, invalid also in the latter. Lord St. Leonards, therefore, has very judiciously prefixed in the introduction to the former editions of his treatise, a compendious essay on the nature of uses, which he has embodied in the first chapter of the present edition. But in his love of technicality he illustrates the perverse tendencies of metaphysical lawyers, while Mr. Chance, although he certainly caters with care for the requirements of practice, is not sufficiently mindful of theory, and just principles.

"Incidit in Scyllam, qui vult vitare Charybdem."

Perhaps an eclectic writer may yet combine in a single work the respective merits of both authors.

The principles which should govern the arrangement of the parts of a treatise on so intricate a branch of law as powers, should mainly regard their incidents from a chronological point of view, both as to their historical origin, and also as to the instruments by which they may be created, transferred, suspended, extinguished, or exercised. The author of such a treatise might be expected to view them in their first rise, prior to the Statute of Uses, and to distinguish them carefully from licences and common law authorities, as regards the feudal theory of our law of real property, and in the next place to examine them as affected by the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8, c. 10. He should then proceed to consider their legal effect at the present day, observing the order in which they may be expected most frequently to occur in practice, or in the history of a single transaction. According to this method, our supposed author would next describe the instruments by which they may be created, then classify their different kinds as general or special, appendant or in gross, &c., and also point out the person by whom, and in favour of whom, they may be executed. Next, both in point of logic and chronology, the questions appertaining to their suspension and merger would appear proper to be treated of, before he approached the conclusion of his work. This should naturally end with a detailed account of the nature of appointments general and special, &c., their relationship to the original deed, to the appointor and the appointee, the rule of perpetuity, and equitable relief. Neither of the extant treatises on powers appears to have been mapped out with a close regard to theory or to convenience. Thus, after the preliminary chapters on uses and powers, Lord St. Leonards gives, in the third chapter, an outline "of the modes by which powers may be suspended, extinguished, or merged;" while the fourth and sixth chapters treat respectively of the creation and transfer of powers. But these are circumstances attendant upon powers in se prior to their being exercised, and should naturally precede any comments relating to their suspension or merger. Chapter nine mixes up the discussion of the creation of powers with that of their execution. He also places the chapter on "limitations in default of appointment" after six chapters which treat of the execution of powers. This violates both the rule of progression and harmony to which we have referred. The place of the last five chapters is also very faulty, inasmuch as these treat respectively of powers to appoint to relations or to children, powers to jointure, to lease, sell, and appoint new trustees. Powers, no doubt, are operative only when exercised in appointments, as causes are manifested only by their effects; and it may therefore be alleged that these chapters, though nominally relating to powers, are, virtually, commentaries on certain classes of appointments. We can only say, then, that these chapters ought to be so entitled, and should not be designated in a manner that is calculated to perplex the student; as the author re-enters in them upon the consideration of powers after their classification, and even the modes of their execution had been fully detailed. But there is no doubt that this defect is one of place and not of title, and that they should be considered in that portion of the treatise which relates to the classification of powers. Mr. Chance, with a like disregard of order and conciseness of arrangement, passes directly from the question of the creation and construction of powers, to that of appointments. He also returns back in the chapters at the close of his work to treat of powers of jointure, portion, lease, &c.; while the last chapter treats of the suspension of powers.

Lord St. Leonards appears to us to have erred both in excess and in defect, for while his treatise will not always be found to supply the information most needed in practice, he has, on the other hand, devoted a considerable space to extraneous topics, such as election, while in the former editions he has revelled with delight in the idealistic labyrinths of the scintilla juris. We willingly bear with the exclusion of any lengthened comments upon the doctrine of election from Mr. Chance's treatise, since we find in it no metaphysical speculations, nor any discussion of the scintilla juris. Lord St. Leonards, not content with his previous investigations as to the nature of this scintilla, finally had it altogether abolished by the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 7. This enactment appears to us to have been altogether unnecessary. Contingent uses were sufficiently protected prior to that Act. The mode in which that protection was carried out by the rules of law, was a much vexed juridical question. But a lawyer would as soon think of questioning the security of a contingent use prior to the passing of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, as he would of impugning the soundness of the decision in Smith v. Dormer v. Packhurst, 3 Atk. 135. Lord St. Leonards, however, with scholastic trepidation, came finally to regard the object of his speculation as something in itself real, which required an actual demolition at the hands of Parliament. Thirty-four pages of the former edition of Powers were devoted to the discussion of this scholastic question. Yet in that very edition Lord St. Leonards says, p. 44, "No inquiry is ever made to meet the difficulties which arise from this doctrine"—and again, p. 45, "No case ever occurred in practice in which the point fairly arose." All were agreed that the Statute of Uses could not be construed so as
